Mr. President, the decree went forth in 1893 for us as it did for the Indian people. The inventive genius, the great energy, the vast resources of the American people have enabled them not only to survive that blow, but to a return to some measure of prosperity, but be not unmindful that that prosperity is very much like snow that falls in a storm. It is drifted. Wherever there is a great combination and a trust, there prosperity is deep; and wherever it does not exist, the ground is bare.

This country is not developing with an even and steady tread; its development is spotted, sectional, and unevenly distributed. It is not the healthy growth in which all the limbs are growing naturally and in just proportion, but where a limb here and there is shooting off into a rapid and sturdy growth, and in which others are shriveling. Whether the statemanship of this country will be equal to the task of resolving these conditions without catastrophe I know not.

But, above all things, it is clear to my humble conception that the duty of the American people is to hold fast to that which they have long had and to that which they have, and not to give way before the line of monarchs from the Old World or from the New that are endeavoring to induce them to adopt the gold standard.

I believe, Mr. President, that reversing our policy for gold and marching back for silver and gold, even as those nations have marched for gold, we can yet avert the catastrophe which overshadows the future and threatens the prosperity of mankind.

So believing, I shall stand by the dollar of the common law, by the dollar of the Constitution, by the dollar of America, which to-day, erect, proud, self-sustaining, and triumphant, is worth as much as when it first emanated from the mint over a century ago and which will go on to fulfill its mission for the betterment of this people if not interrupted by unwise laws. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would remind the occupants of the galleries that applause is not permitted.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 41) to authorize the President to place Andrew Geddes on the retired list with the rank of captain. It is a short bill, which has heretofore passed the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. I do not object, but the Senator from Nevada is on the floor and wants to address the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. I beg pardon.

Mr. STEWART. I wish to make a few remarks in this connection.

Mr. PETTUS. Will the Senator from Nevada yield to me for a moment to offer an amendment?

Mr. STEWART. I yield.

Mr. PETTUS. I submit an amendment to the bill under consideration.

Mr. VEST. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert at the end of section 1 as amended in the Senate, and as a part of said section 1, the following:

Gold coins and silver dollars coined by the United States shall be a legal tender in all payments at their nominal value when not below the weight and limit of tolerance provided by law for the single coin, and when reduced in weight below such standard and tolerance shall be a legal tender at valuation in proportion to their actual weight.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I rise to correct a misapprehension, and I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Rhode Island. I maintain that this bill destroys the full legal-tender power of the silver dollar. The House bill does it also, but particularly the Senate substitute. The first section of the Senate amendment makes it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain the parity of value of all the coins and all the money issued by the United States. That parity has hitherto been maintained by the legal-tender power of the silver dollar being equal to the legal-tender power of the gold dollar, and with all the discrimination against the silver dollar it has stood firm, worth a dollar. That legal-tender power is to be taken away from it, and in order to maintain the parity they have to do other things which are provided in this bill. The first provision is for a reserve of a hundred and fifty million dollars, and it is provided that that reserve shall be gold. Now, the reserve created by the Department was a coin reserve, but this provides that it shall be a gold reserve. That takes away the functions of silver, for silver could be in the reserve as well as gold, if you had a coin reserve. That is another point.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the Senator from Nevada let me ask him a question? I have listened, but could not hear some of the utterances of the Senator. Does he maintain that this measure will take away the legal-tender power of the silver dollar?

Mr. STEWART. It takes away the legal-tender power of the silver dollar.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Has anything the Senator has said up to this time indicated that the legal-tender power of the silver dollar is taken away?

Mr. STEWART. No. What I have said up to this time shows that it makes it the duty of the Secretary to maintain the parity.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Ah, yes.

Mr. STEWART. And what follows shows that there will not be parity unless he avails himself of those things. It takes away the legal-tender power of the silver dollar so far as the reserve is concerned. It substitutes a gold reserve for a coin reserve.

Then it goes further and provides that the reserve shall be replenished from time to time, if it fail to be sufficient, by the sale of 3 per cent gold bonds in unlimited amount. They are to be payable in gold, not payable in gold or silver, as our present bonds are. All the bonds which have been issued heretofore are, in so many words, payable in coin of the standard value of July 14, 1870. Now, the bonds to be issued under the proposed act are payable in gold. That takes away the function of silver.

Then, again, this bill makes it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to receive all outstanding bonds and to issue therefor gold bonds, so that the entire indebtedness will be gold. Every national obligation now outstanding by the express terms of the statute is payable in coin of the standard value of July 14, 1870, but by this proposed act all the bonded obligations will be payable in gold. That takes away the function and debt-paying power of the silver dollar.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Do I understand the Senator to say—I ask for information merely—that a provision of the new law which contemplates the issuance of bonds, interest and principal payable in gold, takes away from the present silver dollar its legal-tender quality?

Mr. STEWART. Yes. You understand me to say exactly that.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I hope the Senator will be more extended than usual and explain to us how, for I am sure I can not understand it.

Mr. STEWART. I will show you. It does it in the same manner that the legal-tender power of the greenback was taken away, by saying it should not be received for interest on the public debt and in the payment of customs dues. That crippled its power. They organized a gold board at once. If the silver dollar will not pay a Government debt it is nonsense to talk of its being a full legal-tender dollar. It is the full legal-tender power which has kept the silver dollar where it is.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Suppose a railroad company issues a bond payable in gold, as many of them have done, or suppose money was lent, as it sometimes is in the West and in other parts of the country, principal and interest payable in gold, is silver thereby robbed of its legal-tender quality?

Mr. STEWART. Yes, to that extent; but not by the General Government. With all the obligations of the Government payable in gold alone, to tell me that silver stands on the same footing with gold is ridiculous. The bonded obligations of the Government are to be payable in gold, and you provide here for an unlimited bonded debt. Every time the reserve falls below the specified limit it is the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to sell more bonds.

Then comes along right here the duty to maintain the parity. He can very properly under that say that customs dues must be paid in gold because it requires gold to pay the debt; that we can not discharge the obligation. Under this bill the silver dollar is no longer full legal tender. It is robbed of that, and when you commence to rob it of its full legal tender you degrade it and you will have to redeem it under the provision requiring——

Mr. TELLER. That is what they want to do.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. STEWART. They will find a way to redeem it under the provision which requires parity. Mr. Carlisle said that under the law, where it was full legal tender, if it fell below par and was presented for redemption he would redeem it in gold; that he was authorized to do it.

Mr. WOLCOTT. One more question. If by the provision of a law silver notes were redeemable only in silver and not in gold, is gold robbed of its legal-tender quality thereby?

Mr. STEWART. Yes; to that extent.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Then gold ceases to be full legal tender.

Mr. STEWART. It has been as much redeemable in gold as in silver heretofore.

Mr. WOLCOTT. But would a provision of law that silver certificates should be redeemed only in silver rob gold of its legal-tender quality?

Mr. STEWART. They are not robbed at all. They are simply——

Mr. WOLCOTT. Oh, I understand.

Mr. STEWART. It is a mere certificate of deposit.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I see.

Mr. STEWART. They are merely depositing silver, and have a right to return it. It is not legal tender. It is not a parallel case at all. This bill takes away from silver its debt-paying power as to all Government obligations. It will very soon be taken away on everything else. Under the obligation to maintain parity the Secretary can very well say that he has got to redeem the silver dollar, and he will redeem it, as Mr. Carlisle said he would, under the law as it then stood. When silver, so far as legislation is concerned, was on precisely the same basis as gold, full legal tender, he said he would redeem it in gold, if necessary, in order to maintain its parity with gold. But it being full legal tender, the necessity never arose. But now silver can not be used to pay the public debt, and the reserves are all in gold. Silver has very few uses. The only uses left are private. They will very likely require its redemption in gold, and it will be very easy, in order to get rid of it altogether, to present it to the Treasury and require payment in gold. The Secretary can redeem it in gold and issue more bonds. It will be an excuse for more bonds. There is to be a reserve of a hundred and fifty million dollars. If the reserve falls below $100,000,000, he can sell bonds. To tell me that under the machinery of this system the silver dollar will still exist, with all the functions it had before, is to tell me that I do not know anything at all; that my senses are gone.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 31st ultimo approved and signed the following act and joint resolution:

An act (S. 1933) to provide an American register for the steam whaler Bowhead; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 3) granting permission for the erection of a monument in Washington, D. C., for the ornamentation of the national capital and in honor of Samuel Hahnemann.

The message also announced that the President had on this day approved and signed the act (S. 2179) relating to the Twelfth and subsequent censuses, and giving to the Director thereof additional power and authority in certain cases, and for other purposes.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 1092) to set apart a portion of the Arlington estate for experimental agricultural purposes, and place said portion under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Agriculture and his successors in office, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The bill (H. R. 7739) to amend "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1899, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 77) to provide for pay to certain retired officers of the Marine Corps was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

TREATY OR AGREEMENT WITH SULTAN OF SULU.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the Senate of January 24, 1900, I transmit herewith "a copy of the report, and all accompanying papers, of Brig. Gen. John C. Bates, in relation to the negotiation of a treaty or agreement made by him with the Sultan of Sulu on the 20th day of August, 1899."

I reply to the request in said resolution for further information that the payments of money provided for by the agreement will be made from the revenues of the Philippine Islands unless Congress shall otherwise direct.

Such payments are not for specific services, but are a part of the consideration moving to the Sulu tribe or nation under the agreement, and they have been stipulated for, subject to the action of Congress, in conformity with the practice of this Government from the earliest times in its agreements with the various Indian nations occupying and governing portions of territory subject to the sovereignty of the United States.

WILLIAM McKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 1, 1900.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would like advice as to what to do with this message.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the message and accompanying papers lie on the table, and that they be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

SUFFRAGE IN NORTH CAROLINA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair wishes to lay before the Senate a request from the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] which, in his necessary absence, he requested the Chair to give. The notice will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

That on Tuesday, February 6, after the routine morning business, he will address the Senate on the suffrage resolution offered by his colleague [Mr. PRITCHARD].

ANDREW GEDDES.

Mr. GALLINGER. I now ask unanimous consent to consider the bill (S. 41) to authorize the President to place Andrew Geddes on the retired list with the rank of captain. A similar bill has passed the Senate once or twice before, and I think it will not lead to discussion.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. CARTER. Is there a report connected with the bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. There is a long report from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CARTER. Of this session?

Mr. GALLINGER. Of this session; certainly. A similar bill passed at the last session without objection at all. The report was read, I remember, in the last Congress.

Mr. CARTER. Let the report be again read. I should like to hear what it is.

Mr. HOAR. I understand it is a very long report, and I suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that instead of reading the report he state the substance of it.

Mr. WOLCOTT. We should like to hear the report.

Mr. GALLINGER. As other Senators have little matters that they would like to have attended to, I withdraw my request, for the purpose of permitting Senators to examine the report. I know that no Senator will object after he has read the report. I will ask consent to-morrow or some other time for its further consideration.

AGREEMENT WITH THE FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I desire to obtain an order of the Senate, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed order will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to withdraw from the files of the Senate and transmit to the Secretary of the Interior a copy of the agreement between the United States commissioners to negotiate with the Five Civilized Tribes and the commissioners on the part of the Creek (or Muscogee) Nation, concluded at Muscogee, Ind. T., February 1, 1899.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is in response to the request of the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The Secretary of the Interior asked that the agreement should be returned for the purpose of amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. I supposed it had already been done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the order.

The order was adopted.

YELLOWSTONE NATIONAL PARK.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from Colorado yield to me?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I withdraw the motion for the present.

Mr. WARREN. By the courtesy of the Senator from Colorado, I desire to call up the first bill on the Calendar, the bill (S. 198) to reimburse the State of Wyoming for money expended by the Territory of Wyoming in protecting and preserving the Yellowstone National Park during the years 1884, 1885, and 1886. It was passed over a couple of days since, when I was absent. A similar bill passed the Senate three times heretofore, and it will lead to no discussion.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has heretofore been read.

Mr. SPOONER. What is the amount involved in the bill?

Mr. WARREN. Seven thousand seven hundred and eighty dollars.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHOCTAW, OKLAHOMA AND GULF RAILROAD.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 2354) authorizing railroad lines in Indian Territory to lease or consolidate continuous lines under certain circumstances.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That it shall and may be lawful for the Choctaw, Oklahoma and Gulf Railroad Company to purchase the railroad and other property of, or to consolidate with, any other railroad company incorporated under the laws of any State or Territory of the United States whose lines may now or hereafter form a continuous line of railroad with it, either directly or by means of an intervening railroad, upon complying with the regulations and requirements of the laws of the State or Territory in which such road is located, applicable to such purchase or consolidation.

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of perfecting such purchase or consolidation it shall be lawful for said Choctaw, Oklahoma and Gulf Railroad Company to increase its stock and to guarantee the payment of the principal and interest of the bonds and other obligations of any company whose property is thus acquired, or of dividends on its preferred or guaranteed stock: Provided also, That the power conferred by this section shall also extend to like guaranties of the bonds, obligations, and dividends on stocks of companies whose roads may now or hereafter be leased to the said Choctaw, Oklahoma and Gulf Railroad Company.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill enlarging the powers of the Choctaw, Oklahoma and Gulf Railroad Company."

PENSIONS TO SURVIVORS OF INDIAN WARS.

Mr. McBRIDE. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate take up for immediate consideration the bill (S. 340) to amend an act entitled "An act granting pensions to the survivors of the Indian wars of 1832 to 1842, inclusive, known as the Black Hawk war, Creek war, Cherokee disturbances, and the Seminole war," approved July 27, 1892.

Mr. COCKRELL. I called for the Calendar the other day and we disposed of a great many cases. I think it turns out that nearly all the first cases on the Calendar are bills in which my constituents are interested, and I do not believe I can justly or properly consent that all these cases shall be taken up that are away behind on the Calendar when if we were to go to the Calendar we could reach them all in a very short time.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I suggest that the Senator from Missouri yield and let the Senator from Oregon call up his bill, and after that I will have an opportunity to renew the motion for an executive session. That is a compromise which would fit everybody.

Mr. COCKRELL. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which will be read for information.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act granting pensions to the survivors of the Indian wars of 1832 to 1842, inclusive, known as the Black Hawk war, Creek war, Cherokee disturbances, and the Seminole war," approved July 27, 1892, be, and the same is hereby, amended and extended so as to include the names of the surviving officers and enlisted men who served for thirty days or more and were honorably discharged under the United States military, Territorial, or provisional authorities in the Florida and Georgia Seminole Indian war of 1817 and 1818; the Fevre River Indian war of Illinois of 1827; the Sac and Fox Indian war of 1831; the Sabine Indian disturbances of 1836 and 1837; the Cayuse Indian war of 1847 and 1848 on the Pacific coast; the Florida wars with the Seminole Indians from 1842 to 1858; the Texas and New Mexico Indian war of 1849 to 1856; the California Indian disturbances of 1851 and 1852; the Utah Indian disturbances of 1850 to 1853; and the Oregon and Washington Territory Indian wars from 1851 to 1856, inclusive, and also to include the surviving widows of such officers and enlisted men: Provided, That such widows have not remarried: And provided further, That where there is no record of enlistment or muster into service in any of the wars mentioned in this act, or the original act of which it is a supplement, the record of pay by the United States shall be accepted as evidence of said service.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Pensions if any estimate has been made as to the number of persons who are now for the first time to be pensioned, running back to the year 1818, and from that time to the present. I should like to know how large a door this opens for additions to our pension expenditures.

Mr. McBRIDE. There is an estimate contained in the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions, which I shall be pleased to send to the Senator.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Is it a long report?

Mr. McBRIDE. It is rather a long report.

Mr. GALLINGER. I can state the substance of this bill in a very few words. A similar bill has been reported and passed by the Senate at least twice before. It is claimed, in the first place, that it was the intent of the act that was passed to pension the survivors of the Black Hawk war, Creek war, Cherokee disturbances, and the Seminole war to include all these persons, but that it did not. One year ago there was a careful estimate made, and it was shown then that it would place on the pension roll a little over 7,000 persons and that the cost for the first year would be $730,000. It was estimated that those persons, according to the expectation of life, would all be dead in about seven or seven and a half years, which would be six and a half years from the present time. There are very few survivors of some of the wars. Of the Seminole there are only five; of the Fevre River or Winnebago disturbance, fourteen, and so on.

The simple fact is that this is a bill which has gathered up the surviving old men who fought in those early Indian wars, and it is merely a question for the Senate to determine whether or not they are deserving of pensions. My own opinion, while I have been striving as best I could to keep down the pension roll to a reasonable limit, is that these old people who are now on the verge of the grave, and who did render the Government valuable service in those early wars when the country needed defenders as much as it needs defenders now, ought not to be neglected.

For that reason I have given my support to the measure. As I said a moment ago, I think a similar bill has passed the Senate twice before, and it was reported favorably in the House, but did not pass the House.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not know whether the Senator from New Hampshire stated just the amount that would be paid under this bill per annum.

Mr. GALLINGER. It would be the first year $730,000, or thereabouts, and then it would gradually grow less for seven and a half years, when, according to the tables of expectancy of life, all the pensioners would be dead.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. What would be the amount?

Mr. GALLINGER. It would amount to about $5,000,000 in gross, the aggregate.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does this include all the Indian wars, or are we likely to have a similar measure brought forward to pension the survivors of other Indian wars?

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not think it includes the Osage Indian war.

Mr. GALLINGER. I had supposed it would include everything else. Certainly the Senators from the Western States——

Mr. TELLER. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee if he has not a provision in the bill that a man must have been in the Indian war and paid by the Government? That is the way I understand it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Where they can not make their proof, if they show they received a land warrant——

Mr. SPOONER. Does the bill include the survivors of the Black Hawk war?

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, they have already been pensioned. They were pensioned under the act of 1892.

Mr. TELLER. I understand that the man must show that he was paid by the Government for his services.

Mr. GALLINGER. He must make conclusive proof that he did render military service. We are not pensioning them without proof.

Mr. TELLER. I know that, but I understand that in addition you say if the Government has recognized him by paying him, then he becomes a United States soldier to the extent that he may have a pension. A good many people in my part of the country in the early days fought the Indians and paid their own bills.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have not a copy of the bill before me, but it is my impression that if they can not make any other proof, that is conclusive proof—or if they had a land warrant.

Mr. TELLER. It ought to be conclusive proof without any other, it seems to me, if the Government recognized him and gave him a land warrant.

Mr. GALLINGER. I agree with the Senator on that point. Perhaps the bill is faulty. I did not draw the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. If there are some omissions from the bill and it is going to lead to discussion, I think I will ask the Senator from Oregon if he will not allow it to pass over until some time when we can all of us find out whether everybody in our own States is embraced that we would like to have provided for in it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will ascertain whether there is any objection to the present consideration of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. WOLCOTT. If there is to be discussion, as I understand there is to be, I feel called upon to object.

Mr. McBRIDE. I understand that the discussion has closed.

Mr. WOLCOTT. If the discussion has closed I do not object.

Mr. McBRIDE. A similar bill has been passed twice by the Senate, and I trust the bill will be passed now.

Mr. ALLISON. I should be glad to know the limitation of the bill before the discussion closes.

Mr. McBRIDE. The bill applies to the veterans of the Indian wars named the provisions of the law now applying to the veterans of the Black Hawk Indian war.

Mr. ALLISON. I know, but is there a limitation as to time?

Mr. McBRIDE. It specifies the wars and the dates and who are to be the beneficiaries under the wars designated.

Mr. ALLISON. Would it cover the Indian war in Minnesota in 1863?

Mr. SPOONER. I ask that the bill be read.

Mr. McBRIDE. It covers no war within less than forty years from the present time. It has been the policy of Congress to give a service pension after forty years from the time the service terminated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be again read.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the Order of Business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No. 189.

The Secretary again read the bill.

Mr. STEWART. I observe that Nevada is omitted. I object.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, February 2, 1900, at 12 o'clock meridian.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

QUESTION OF JURISDICTION AS BETWEEN THE APPROPRIATIONS COMMITTEE AND THE COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair submits the opinion which he will now give to the House, on a matter submitted to him by the House a few days ago.

On Monday, January 22, 1900, by the unanimous consent of the House, the following was submitted and agreed to:

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] asks unanimous consent of the House that all orders—

Touching so much of House Document No. 291, first session Fifty-sixth Congress, as refers to the Rock Island Armory, Rock Island, Ill., and to Springfield Armory, Springfield, Mass.; and

Touching so much of the estimate of $750,000 for infantry, cavalry, and artillery equipment, submitted on page 135 of the Book of Estimates for the fiscal year 1901, as includes machinery, tools, and fixtures for their manufacture at the arsenals; and

Touching so much of the estimate of $1,100,000 for the manufacture of arms, submitted on page 136 of the Book of Estimates for the fiscal year 1901, as includes machinery, tools, and fixtures for their manufacture—be vacated, and the same shall be placed on the Speaker's table for reference under the rules, as though no orders had heretofore been taken by the House or the Speaker touching the reference of these items.

In order to consider intelligently the matter submitted, the Chair calls attention to the exact provisions covered by the above submission. In Document No. 291, first session Fifty-sixth Congress, the following is a detailed statement from said document of the matter submitted:

Rock Island Armory, Rock Island, Ill.:
Completing the installation of the plant and the purchase of tools, fixtures, and other appliances for the manufacture of small arms in the armory shops at Rock Island Arsenal, to be available until expended or otherwise ordered by Congress (act of March 3, 1899, volume 30, page 1073, section 1)	$500,000.00
Springfield Armory, Springfield, Mass.:
Addition to water shops (submitted)	95,598.71
Additional machinery for water shops (submitted)	90,690.70
Additional machinery for hill shops (submitted)	113,428.60
(To be available until expended or otherwise ordered by Congress.)
Total	299,718.01

The parts submitted from the Book of Estimates for the year ending June 30, 1901, are to be found on pages 135 and 136 of said book, and are as follows:

Ordnance, ordnance stores, and supplies.—For manufacture of metallic ammunition for small arms and ammunition for reloading cartridges, including the cost of targets and material for target practice, ammunition for burials at the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers and its several branches, including National Soldiers' Home in Washington, D. C.; marksmen's medals and insignia for all arms of the service—

[i]ncluding machinery, tools, and fixtures for their manufacture at the arsenals.

Manufacture of arms.—Manufacture, repairing, procuring, and issuing arms at the national armories, including machinery, tools, and fixtures for their manufacture.

The part in dispute in the first item is in these words:

Including machinery, tools, and fixtures for their manufacture at the arsenals.

The part submitted in the next item is as follows:

Including machinery, tools, and fixtures for their manufacture.

It will be seen that the four items in controversy provide only for fitting the plants for the purpose of doing certain work, and provide no money for manufacturing articles after the plants are created. The Committee on Appropriations contends that it is entitled to appropriate money for establishing plants of the kind expressed in the items in controversy, and concedes to the Committee on Military Affairs the right to appropriate the money for the manufacture of the articles turned out by these plants. The Committee on Military Affairs contends that it is entitled not only to appropriate money for the manufacturing of the articles, but to make the appropriations for the installation and enlargement of the plants. In other words, the Committee on Military Affairs contends for the entire control through appropriations of the whole subject-matter embraced in these four items. It is to settle this controversy between these two committees that the matter, with the consent of the House, has been submitted to the Chair.

Let us first see what the rules provide in respect to these two committees. Rule XI, section 3, is as follows:

To appropriation of the revenue for the support of the Government, as herein provided, viz, for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses; for sundry civil expenses; for fortifications and coast defenses; for the District of Columbia; for pensions; and for all deficiences: to the Committee on Appropriations.

Rule XI, section 12, is as follows:

To the military establishment and the public defense, including the appropriations for its support and for that of the Military Academy: to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Looking at these two sections together, and without considering any other matters, it would seem clear to the Chair that all matters pertaining to the military establishment and the public defense, excepting for fortifications and coast defenses, and excepting deficiencies for the military establishment and the public defense, should be considered by the Committee on Military Affairs. In other words, that the Committee on Appropriations should be limited in its consideration of appropriations to fortifications and coast defenses and to deficiencies growing out of these, and also to deficiencies growing out of appropriations for the military establishment and the public defense.

The Chair, however, feels compelled to go beyond the clear declarations of these sections of Rule XI and see what precedents there are bearing upon the question in issue. The two committees have exhaustively investigated the precedents and submitted the results to the Chair. As stated by the Chair in a recent decision, precedents should be followed where possible. It is a great advantage to the Congress to have before it the decisions of previous Congresses on any question liable to come up. If the decisions of the past, carefully considered, made by Speakers, Chairmen, and by the House itself, are to be disregarded, confusion and uncertainty would constantly prevail. The Chair has already indicated in another decision that he would prefer to follow a precedent clearly established, though the question if originally presented to him would receive different treatment.

Let us look, then, at the history of this class of legislation: Prior to December 18, 1885, with the single exception of the Agricultural bill, all appropriation bills were given to the Committee on Appropriations.

In the second session of the Forty-sixth Congress, in 1880, the Agricultural bill was given to the Committee on Agriculture. A careful examination of the Statutes at Large will show that during the last twenty years the sundry civil bill appropriated for buildings, roads, sewers, bridges, and machinery at the arsenals and armories. This, it will be observed, goes back of the segregation of the appropriation bills in 1885, and it brings the action of the House up to the current fiscal year, when the first exception is found. The military bill for the present year has made provision for such appropriations. During the same twenty years the Army bill appropriated for the manufacture of small arms, equipments, ammunition, etc. It should be borne in mind also, in this connection, that the very first appropriation bills brought in by these two great committees, immediately following the segregation of the appropriation bills, gave all the matters in dispute which were then provided for to the Appropriations Committee, and none of these to the Committee on Military Affairs.

This would indicate the first interpretation which the House put upon these bills when the segregation took place in the Forty-ninth Congress.

And it should also be borne in mind that the Rock Island Arsenal was provided for in the sundry civil bill, following the segregation, appropriation being made for machinery and shop fixtures. (See 24 Stat. L., page 529.)

In the appropriation bill for the current year, all of the items in controversy, or most of them, will be found in the Army appropriation bill. This is exceptional. Much stress is laid upon this fact by the Committee on Military Affairs, because objection was not made by the Committee on Appropriations.

On the contrary, the Committee on Appropriations claim that this was overlooked by them and grew out of the great pressure of work before the several committees during their excessive labors in the last Congress, and also because the Military Committee was given so much way and consideration incident to our wars. It is proper to state, in this connection, that the Book of Estimates invited this action by the Military Committee. That book adopted new phraseology in the estimates, differing from prior estimates, so that these items were before the Committee on Military Affairs when making up its bill, and were not before the Committee on Appropriations so as to attract its attention, as they had done in the past. The Chair is of the opinion that this should in no way be considered as a precedent to govern his decision as against the uniform practice, long, well-considered discussions, and carefully rendered opinions prior thereto.

The Chair desires to say a word in regard to this Book of Estimates.

As the House is doubtless aware, the estimates of the several Departments are sent, as required by law, to the Secretary of the Treasury, who compiles the Book of Estimates. It is then printed in a branch office of the Government Printing Office, under the supervision of the Public Printer, in the Treasury Department.

The Chair has investigated to see whether these Books of Estimates, or the several parts thereof, have been referred to the several committees, and finds the practice to be that these Books of Estimates are sent in bulk to the document room, and there the several committees get the books. With one exception, the Chair is unable to find that they have ever been referred by the Speaker, although the Book of Estimates is addressed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives. Neither in the last Congress nor in this Congress have they come to him, and therefore they have not been referred by him to the several committees.

During this period many bitter contests have arisen between the two committees on this subject of jurisdiction, and each time the final decision of the matter has been in favor of the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations.

These decisions were made in relation to subjects which the Appropriations Committee claimed were, and had been, properly part of the fortifications bill. In this case all the conditions are the same, except that the items in dispute are claimed for the sundry civil bill.

While acting as Chairmen in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, decisions favorable to the Committee on Appropriations have been made by Messrs. Blount, of Georgia; Payson, of Illinois; HOPKINS, of Illinois, and Springer, of Illinois. Mr. Allen, of Michigan, while in the chair, made a different ruling, but the House promptly, on motion of Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, sustained the claim of the Committee on Appropriations by striking the paragraph in controversy from the Army bill. Many days have been spent in discussions of the question, one struggle lasting for two entire days, and another struggle for three entire days, but always resulting in favor of the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations, whether the decision was made by a Chairman, or by the Committee of the Whole House, or by the House itself.

The several controversies that have taken place were for the purpose of maintaining the individuality of the fortifications bill, and also of the Army bill. Each of the great appropriation bills has an individuality which it has retained for about thirty years and which the House has shown itself reluctant to violate. For instance, the Appropriations Committee is given under the rule jurisdiction of the subject of "fortifications and coast defenses." Field guns for the use of the Army would scarcely seem to properly belong to this committee, but it has been decided repeatedly that the Appropriations Committee has jurisdiction of the subject of field guns, because their fabrication for a long term of years belonged to the fortifications appropriation bill. For the same reason the Committee on Appropriations has been given and held jurisdiction of Watervliet Arsenal, where heavy guns are made.

The Chair therefore holds that the appropriations for the manufacture of small arms and equipments for the infantry, cavalry, and artillery at the armories and arsenals are within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Military Affairs, and that the appropriations for buildings, installation of plant, machinery, tools, fixtures for manufacturing small arms and equipments belong to the Committee on Appropriations, and accordingly the Chair refers the four items in controversy to that committee, subject to the approval of the House.

If there is no objection, the reference will accordingly be made.

[After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman from New York takes the floor, I ask him to yield to me for a few minutes to make a conference report on the urgent deficiency bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will yield for that purpose, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CANNON. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the conference report and that the Clerk read the report of the House committee as to its effect.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the conference report and read the statement. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The statement of the House conferees was read, as follows:

J. G. CANNON,
S. S. BARNEY,
L. F. LIVINGSTON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. GRIGGS. Do I understand the gentleman to say that that objectionable clause, or proviso, rather, with reference to the deficiency on account of the rural free delivery was stricken from the conference report?

Mr. CANNON. Yes, sir; the report of the House conferees was insisted upon, which was that that was already the law.

Mr. COWHERD. Do I understand the motion of the chairman to mean that the adoption of the report be agreed upon?

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does it affect the amount of judgments as rendered by the Court of Claims on Indian depredation claims?

Mr. CANNON. All that have been certified.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I notice some of the items.

Mr. CANNON. The House inserted those items so far as they had been certified. There were additional judgments rendered after the House made up the bill that were certified to the Senate, and the House agrees to their insertion, and as the bill stands now it provides for all judgments that have been certified up to date.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CANNON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

Mr. CANNON. Now I want to call the attention of the House for about a moment to what we can not agree upon. One is the amendment, numbered 5, of the Senate, to be found on page 10 of the bill, as follows:

Post-office and custom-house, Kansas City, Mo.: For painting and installation of passenger elevators, $35,000.

The facts touching this amendment, very briefly, are these: The limit of cost for the construction of the post-office and court-house at Kansas City was, as I recollect, $1,300,000. That building is almost complete, and can be occupied, if this appropriation is made, as we are informed, about the 1st of May—certainly, as they state, not later than the 1st of June.

If this appropriation is not made, the Supervising Architect says, in substance, that the gentleman from the Kansas City district [Mr. COWHERD], as I understand it, claims that it can not be occupied until this additional appropriation is made for the finishing of the building and the putting in of the elevators. So that your conference committee is of opinion that this great building, the limit of cost of which is $1,300,000, can not be available for a much desired service until this or a similar appropriation is made. Your committee did not agree to this Senate amendment. In fact, the Committee on Appropriations declined to report this item to the House in considering it, because it was not authorized by law, and knowing that there were a great lot of public buildings the erection or completion of which is delayed because of the increased cost of material and labor, some of them having been commenced and some of them not having been commenced and probably can not be until the limit is enlarged at many places where they are authorized, we felt that the House ought to dispose of this case, and I am frank to say that I believe the House can dispose of it without much embarrassment, because it is unlike a new public building that is authorized.

I am not now speaking under the rule, but upon the merits. It is unlike a new building that is to be authorized for the first time. It is unlike a building that has been authorized and that can not be constructed on account of the increased cost of material and advance in labor; it is practically complete, but for the want of $35,000 outside of the limit it can not be completed and occupied until this appropriation is made. Now, frankly, I believe that is all there is of it. If the appropriation is made, it will be occupied by the 1st of June, and until it or some similar appropriation is made the Government will continue to rent buildings in that city in which to have this service. I believe that is all I desire to state about it at this time. Does the gentleman desire to make any motion about it?

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to move, in regard to this item of disagreement, that the House recede and concur with an amendment changing the word "custom-house" to "court-house," and I would like to make one statement in connection with it.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to the gentleman that if the House concludes to act favorably upon this item the amendment ought to be made, because it speaks of it as a "post-office and custom-house," whereas it is a post-office and court-house, so that the word "custom-house" ought to be stricken out and the word "court-house" inserted. If the House should recede with a view of giving $35,000, the gentleman's amendment ought to be adopted. I now yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Speaker, just one word in regard to the condition that the Government service is in at that place. The post-office at present occupies not only the portion of the old post-office building originally allotted to it, but it occupies sheds that are built out in front of the post-office building. In addition to that they have been compelled to rent the ground floor of a large office building across the alley from the post-office. Now, the post-office has already made arrangements to move into the new building as soon as it can be completed—that is, the portion assigned to them for their use. That will be about the 1st of May or June, and they must move because their lease will expire on the rented quarters.

In addition to that the collector of internal revenue occupies two or three little rooms. He has about twenty clerks in one small room, he writes me, and that it is absolutely necessary for that service that they should be in the new quarters at the time of the large collection, beginning July 1, and that they have already applied for permission to move. This will necessitate the keeping up and maintaining a new building after the 1st of June, as it will be completed, practically, at that time, but the remainder of the offices, and especially the courts and court officials, can not move until these elevators are put in, because they occupy the top floors of the new building and they will not want to move and climb four flights of stairs. Therefore the Government will have to maintain both the old building and the new, which will be unnecessary and an extra cost to the Government of from five hundred to eight hundred dollars a month.

Now, unless this appropriation is made at this time, if it is postponed until it may come in the regular way, which would be some time along in June, the contract for the ironwork can not be let until that time, and it takes three or four months to get the ironwork out and three or four months more to put it in place, so that the occupation of it will be delayed until along some time in November or the 1st of January. So there will be added the extra cost of maintaining the old building as well as the new for all this time.

Mr. CANNON. I want to say to the gentleman right there that it is quite as competent to meet this appropriation of $35,000 upon this bill as it will be to make it on any general bill hereafter without legislation.

Mr. COWHERD. I understood that; and by the regular way I meant a bill increasing the limit of cost, which I understand would have to come from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. CANNON. Strictly speaking—and I want the gentleman's attention to this point—this is an appropriation without legislation. It would be subject to a point of order if offered in the House, but we can not get rid of a Senate amendment by a point of order. I have no doubt now of the absolute necessity of this appropriation before that building can be occupied, but I want the House to take the action with the full information in the premises as to the disagreement about the item.

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman from Missouri allow me a question? I would like to know if, in the letting of the contract for the construction of this building, it did not provide for necessary elevators?

Mr. COWHERD. I can not answer that fully. Perhaps the chairman of the committee can answer it.

Mr. STEELE. Did it not provide for the painting?

Mr. COWHERD. I will answer that. My information is that in the last appropriation there was included two elevators, but owing to the increased cost of material—the price of iron, as the gentleman knows, went up all over the country—they were not able to contract for them inside of the appropriation.

Mr. STEELE. If the work was let by contract——

Mr. CANNON. I am quite sure that no contract was ever made for the elevators, although the law fixing the limit of cost and authorizing the construction of this building did, as I recollect, include elevators; but whether there ought to have been a contract made or not, I am quite sure none was made for the elevators, and here you are a million and three hundred thousand dollars in the building.

Mr. STEELE. How much of this amount was for the building and how much for the elevator? The appropriation appears to have been a lump sum.

Mr. CANNON. The building, as I understand, was to be provided with elevators.

Mr. COWHERD. In addition to that there will be the cleaning down of the outside work and the gilding of the dome.

Mr. STEELE. The circumstances of this case are an indication, and a very strong one, that some person who was responsible for looking after the interests of the Government in this matter has been derelict—has not performed his duty as he should have done. No other conclusion can be arrived at.

Mr. COWHERD. I suggest to the gentleman that this building has been in process of construction for about ten years, and naturally during such a period there would be changes in the cost of material and labor.

Mr. STEELE. That does not conflict with the fact that the purchases of this ironwork should have been made when the price was low. It clearly appears that some one who was responsible for this work ought to have another job.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD] will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:
Strike out the word "custom-house" where it occurs in said amendment and insert in lieu thereof the word "court-house."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. I wish to say a word touching one other item of these amendments, and then I shall be ready, so far as I am concerned, for a vote. I read the amendment to which I refer:

NAVAL OBSERVATORY.

Observation of total eclipse of the sun in May, 1900: For preparation and outfit of instruments and their transportation, the purchase of additional apparatus and materials, including photographic material, the erection of suitable buildings at each station, and generally the expenses of preparation and observation, including the living expenses of parties at the several stations, and the available instruments used in observing the transit of Venus in 1874 and 1882 may be also utilized, $5,000.

Now, the facts about this matter are these: Your committee in reporting the bill to the House had this estimate in substance before it. It also had an estimate of $4,000 for observation of the total eclipse of the sun in May next, to be made by the Smithsonian Institution. As gentlemen are aware, for many years we have appropriated $10,000 for observations of the sun and its effect on the earth, and have provided for a small observatory in connection with that work, called the Astrophysical Observatory.

The latter service does not study ancient astronomy, but modern astronomy—the laws of light and heat, the influence of the sun upon the earth's atmosphere, and all that class of questions known as the new astronomy—the branch of astronomy that did not formerly receive much attention; whereas your committee is informed and believes the fact to be that the Naval Observatory is engaged very properly in the study of the stars, the taking of the correct time, and all kindred questions pertaining to the ordinary, the old, the universal astronomy. After inquiry your committee was fully of the opinion that for the purpose of observing the total eclipse of the sun in May next the Smithsonian Institution, with its instruments, with its knowledge, with its line of investigation, could to the best interests of the Government and of science make these observations.

Their estimate was $4,000, not $5,000, and Professor Langley said that $4,000 would be quite sufficient to make thorough observations touching this total eclipse. We reported that item and did not report the other, and the House concurred with the recommendations of your committee and passed the item of $4,000. Now the Senate leaves in the bill the item of $4,000, but inserts an item of $5,000 for this same service, to be expended by the Naval Observatory. Your committee is informed and believes that one corps of observers on the part of the United States will be quite sufficient and that the other is very largely "leather and prunella;" that there ought not to be two independent sets of observers with their various apparatus for making the observations at different places, the expenses to be paid by the United States; that one corps will be enough. Your committee refused to concur in the Senate amendment, and we present the matter to the House asking it to further insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendment and send the matter to conference.

Mr. ADAMS. I would like to explain that these are two entirely different sets of observations. As explained to me by the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, the Naval Observatory takes observations purely of a mathematical kind and for astronomical purposes, such as the moment of contact, the time of the passage of the eclipse, and the time of departure. These observations are entirely for astronomical purposes and for navigation and for the furnishing of data of that kind.

The proposed observations by the Smithsonian Institution are to be entirely physical in their character, relating to the atmospheric conditions, the differences in light and shadow during eclipse as compared with other times, and similar subjects. The instruments used are of an entirely different character. Those of the Naval Observatory are purely mathematical in their character and for the purpose of making calculations in regard to astronomy and the movements of the other planets. I think it is desirable that both of these observations should be made. There is no conflict at all between them. Their observations are distinctly different in character, and in the interest of science the Smithsonian Institution desires particularly to make these observations, as the occasion only comes at long intervals apart. I am speaking here in the interest of the Smithsonian Institution, as one of the Regents of that Institution.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to the gentleman that while his remarks are very interesting, the appropriation of $4,000 to enable the Smithsonian Institution to make these observations with its different parties is in the bill. It is not in controversy at all; so that that item does not require any advocacy. That item is not in dispute.

Now, just one word, and then I will ask for a vote. In the judgment of your committee, $4,000 will decently, sufficiently, and effectively observe the antics of the sun when in total eclipse in May next, and it is for you to say whether you want to do it twice.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. Who asks for the other appropriation?

Mr. CANNON. The other is a Senate amendment, to duplicate this work under the direction of the Naval Observatory.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. Who asks for it?

Mr. CANNON. Why, the estimate comes as other estimates come, through the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of the Treasury.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist upon its disagreement to this amendment, and consent to the request of the Senate for a further conference.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Does the gentleman insist that the Smithsonian Institution can make all the observations that the other observers could make?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, certainly. That is our information after the best inquiry we can make—that this is proposing to do just double work.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves to further insist upon the disagreement of the House to Senate amendment numbered 26, and to agree to the conference requested by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. I ask for the same conferees, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question.

The SPEAKER. The motion has already carried.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not desire to speak upon that point, but in reference to the conference report on the bill I desire to ask a question.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman from Tennessee will be heard.

There was no objection.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I want to ask the gentleman if I understood him correctly as to the number of items now remaining unadjusted in the conference?

Mr. CANNON. Two.

Mr. RICHARDSON. What are those two?

Mr. CANNON. Well, one is appropriating $35,000 to complete the building at Kansas City.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That and this one are the only two?

Mr. CANNON. I think those are all.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The Secretary of the Treasury asked for $109,000 to pay the rent of the custom-house property in New York and asked to have that item inserted in this urgent deficiency bill. I want to ask the gentleman if that item is included? A letter of January 22, addressed by the Secretary of the Treasury to the committee, asks for $109,000 to pay this rent.

Mr. CANNON. No such estimate had come to the committee at the time the bill was prepared.

Mr. RICHARDSON. No; but the Secretary of the Treasury sent a letter to the Senate, as I understand it——

Mr. CANNON. Not to the House committee.

Mr. RICHARDSON. To the Senate, while the bill was pending there. I want to know whether that item is included.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, it keeps me too busy to keep track of what the House does, and I would have to have the lives of half a dozen Philadelphia lawyers to keep up with the Senate.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But the gentleman ought to know whether the item is in the bill or not.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; the item has never been considered, as far as I know, in the House or any of its committees, or in the Senate either. It has never been called to my attention before.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman is aware of the fact that the Secretary asked to have this included, is he not?

Mr. CANNON. No, I am not aware of it. If he should make an estimate and it should come to my committee, we will investigate it, I will say to the gentleman for his information.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Oh, I have no doubt about that.

Mr. CANNON. We will investigate it and look into it, and if we find it is under the law we will report it and give my friend a chance to make his speech for a third time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am much obliged to the gentleman for the information.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. CANNON, Mr. BARNEY, and Mr. LIVINGSTON.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills and resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 1293. An act for the relief of Francisco V. De Coster;

S. 2279. An act declaring Cuivre River to be not a navigable stream; and

S. R. 75. Joint resolution to print 31,000 copies of the eulogies on Garret A. Hobart, late Vice-President of the United States.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States and the House of Representatives be notified of the election of CHARLES G. BENNETT as Secretary of the Senate.

SENATE BILLS AND RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills and joint resolution of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 1293. An act for the relief of Francisco V. De Coster—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 2279. An act declaring Cuivre River to be not a navigable stream—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. R. 75. Joint resolution to print 31,000 copies of the eulogies on Garret A. Hobart, late Vice-President of the United States—to the Committee on Printing.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. LITTLE. I ask unanimous consent that members addressing the House on this bill be allowed to extend their remarks for five days. It will save a good deal of trouble.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that members who address the committee on the Indian appropriation bill may be allowed to extend their remarks for five days. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. SHERMAN was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7433) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes, with Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts in the chair.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, the arrangement made in the House last evening was that the time between now and 4 o'clock should be equally divided between the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE] and myself. Is the gentleman prepared to occupy some portion of his time now?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should be glad if the gentleman will now proceed.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield twenty-five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado is recognized for twenty-five minutes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer some remarks upon the duty of this Government in the conflict between Great Britain and the South African Republic, and upon the causes of the war between those nations.

One of the bloodiest wars that has ever occurred in the history of the world is now being waged in the Transvaal country. Over 10,000 British casualties have occurred up to this time. The Boers are intrenched with a force of 48,000 men, while the British have in South Africa and on the sea bound for that country 213,000 soldiers, and since their repulse the other day at Spion Kop demands are made for 100,000 more.

When we remember that England had only 80,000 men in the Crimean war, and Wellington only 25,000 soldiers at Waterloo, the magnitude of this struggle becomes apparent.

The war is bound to continue a long period of time, even if England doubles her forces, as the fortifications at Pretoria are impregnable, and the provisions at that point are sufficient to enable the Boers to withstand a siege for two years. Each side is armed with the most destructive weapons of modern warfare, and hence the conflict will not only be of long duration but will be frightful in its bloodshed and destruction.

The world has a most important interest in this conflict, not only for the principle that the right should always triumph, but for the reason that this war is shutting off more than one-third of the world's supply of gold, and its effect is being felt in every moneyed center of the world, causing stringency in matters of finance and in some places disastrous panics.

It is a disgrace to civilization that questions of right should be determined by might; that blood should flow in unlimited quantities, and the great nations of the world stand by without even lifting their voices in behalf of peace.

MEDIATION THE REMEDY.

A peace conference of the leading nations of the world was held last summer at The Hague, and an international treaty was formulated relative to the establishment of peace, which received the signatures of the diplomatic agents of all the 26 governments represented.

That treaty has not yet been ratified by the United States Senate [The Hague treaty was ratified by the United States Senate on February 6, 1900], but in all likelihood it will be within the next few days, as no opposition to it has developed up to this time.

It has always been recognized as a principle of international law that any power could offer mediation between combatants without danger of international complications resulting therefrom. That principle has been recognized in the treaty of The Hague and an express duty imposed upon nations strangers to the controversy to mediate between contending powers in the interest of peace.

Article II of that treaty provides as follows:

In case of serious disagreement and before an appeal to arms, the signatory powers agree to have recourse as far as circumstances allow to the good offices or mediation of one or more friendly powers.

The time has passed when mediation could be asked under that article. It is the next article that imposes the obligation upon nations strangers to the controversy to offer mediation to the states in conflict.

Article III reads as follows:

Independently of this recourse, the signatory powers recommend that one or more powers, strangers to the dispute, should, on their own initiative and as far as circumstances allow, offer their good offices or mediation to the States at variance. Powers strangers to the dispute have the right to offer good offices or mediation, even during the course of hostilities. The exercise of this right can never be regarded by one or the other of the parties in conflict as an unfriendly act.

It is true that the United States representatives above their signatures wrote a statement that nothing in the treaty should be construed to require the United States to intrude upon or entangle itself in the political questions of foreign nations or imply an abandonment of its traditional policy toward purely American questions. Yet such a course as is suggested does not come within the reservation, as mediation is a friendly act to both nations.

But even if the United States were not required by the treaty to mediate, it surely possesses the power, and the moral obligation exists, as clearly as it does upon any of the other nations.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I would like to ask the gentleman from Colorado a question if he will yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Do you know a single instance where a neutral power not a party to the controversy has ever interfered or attempted to mediate without a request from one of the parties to the conflict?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not know, but I do know that this nation even expressed feelings of sympathy for Greece in its conflict with Turkey without any international complications resulting therefrom.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Offers of mediation are not prompted by friendships for either party in the contest, but are the result of circumstances seeming to justify such course upon the part of a neutral power and initiated at the request of one of the parties, and in this instance no request has been made by either the Boers or England. Much as I would like to see the war stopped, our course must be prudent and wise and in harmony with the rules of international law.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But there never has been a writer upon international law that has declared that mediation could be considered as an unfriendly act.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Is it not a prerequisite to interference that a desire shall be expressed by one side or the other for mediation?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think not.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I must contradict the statement, although I am in sympathy with much that the gentleman from Colorado says.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state, Mr. Chairman, that I examined, as late as yesterday afternoon, a work upon international law, which states that never when mediation is offered can it be considered an unfriendly act. The gentleman, I think, has confounded intervention with mediation.

Mediation is in the interest of peace; it is a suggestion for arbitration. It is not, like intervention, to be backed by force. If the parties do not accept it, force is not resorted to. The only effect of mediation, if rejected, is the moral sympathy of the world for the nation willing to arbitrate and against the one refusing so to do.

That influence is so great in the world to-day that no nation would be willing to disregard it.

As this mode of ending hostilities is recommended, in fact enjoined, by the twenty-six great powers of the world, it ought to be invoked in the interest of humanity and civilization, irrespective of the right or wrong of this war. With how much greater reason, then, ought the United States to invoke it when the existence of a sister Republic is endangered and when the war upon the part of Great Britain is the most unjustifiable of any that has occurred in history of modern times.

CAUSES OF THE WAR.

Mr. Chairman, I have read with a great deal of care all that I could find relative to the causes of the war between Great Britain and the South African Republic.

There has been almost a continuous controversy between Great Britain and the Boer people from the time Holland transferred to England her possessions in South Africa.

Upon the one side it has been a heroic struggle for justice and right, and upon the other the exercise of brutal force for oppression and wrong.

The cause of the present war is the interference on the part of Great Britain with the internal affairs of the South African Republic. Great Britain has demanded that the naturalization laws of the little Republic be amended to permit citizenship in five years; that the law giving to a company the exclusive right to manufacture dynamite be repealed; that English be taught in the schools aided by public money; that the taxation upon mines be reduced, and that Johannesburg be given ten representatives in the Volksraad.

Sir, by what right or authority does Great Britain interfere with the internal concerns of an independent government? By what canon of international law does she predicate her right to demand the modification or repeal of the statutes of a republic?

I want to demonstrate beyond the peradventure of a doubt that England has no more right to interfere with the internal affairs of that Republic than we have to interfere with the internal affairs of England. I propose to show by the language of the treaties, solemnly signed and ratified by Great Britain, that the South African Republic is as free to control its internal affairs as the United States is to control its own affairs.

Nay, I propose to show from the declarations made by the most eminent English statesmen, including the present British secretary of the colonies, that no right whatever exists on the part of Great Britain to force reforms on the Transvaal Republic, and that the attempt to do so would be immoral.

HISTORY OF THE BOERS.

Mr. Chairman, the Dutch settled Cape Colony in 1652. They remained under the dominion of Holland, enjoying peace and happiness, for one hundred and fifty-four years. When Napoleon, in 1806, invaded Holland, that country placed under the care of its ally, England, Cape Colony until its own right to independence should be restored. Upon the final overthrow of Napoleon and the restoration of Holland to sovereignty, she transferred to England her colony.

The Boers objected to being sold and delivered like chattels to a country whose laws oppressed them, and they rebelled against Great Britain. The rebellion was soon suppressed, and one of the most severe and cruel executions that have ever occurred in the history of the world took place, at which women and children were compelled to attend and witness the horrible spectacle. The Boers were told by the governor of Cape Colony that if they did not like British rule and the laws of that country, they could leave.

They did. They concluded to leave British territory and establish a government of their own. The fact that they were willing to abandon their farms and homes in the land of their birth is conclusive evidence that they were laboring under a sense of great injustice. But where could they go? The wilds of Africa were as trackless as dangerous. It was inhabited by not only wild beasts but savage men. They nevertheless trekked to get out of British dominion. One long line of 10,000 people left home and farm to brave the dangers of an unexplored region.

They settled in what is now called Natal and established the Republic of Natalia. They bought their lands from the native tribe that owned and possessed the same. The hardships they endured can not be described; but when they began to prosper, Captain Smith, with British soldiers, came to annex the country as a possession of that mighty empire. War followed, and the Boers were beaten. Rather than stand British rule they again trekked to the interior of darkest Africa, to land far beyond any claimed by England. By the last annexation England claimed the territory to the Vaal River. The Boers concluded to go beyond the Vaal, and they there established a republic and called it the Transvaal State.

They then entered into a treaty with Great Britain which recognized the independence of the Transvaal Boers and made the Vaal River the boundary line between the two countries.

That treaty is called the convention of 1852. It was signed at Zand River on the 17th of January of that year, and ratified on April 15, 1852. The recognition of independence was made in the following terms:

The assistant commissioners guarantee in the fullest manner, on the part of the British Government, to the emigrant farmers beyond the Vaal River, the right to manage their own affairs and to govern themselves according to their own laws, without any interference on the part of the British Government, and that no encroachment shall be made by the said Government on the territory beyond, to the north of the Vaal River, with the further assurance that the warmest wish of the British Government is to promote peace, free] trade, and friendly intercourse with the emigrant farmers now inhabiting or who may inhabit that country, it being understood that this system of noninterference is binding upon both parties.

I hold in my hand the full text of the convention, and there is not one syllable that contradicts or modifies the foregoing recognition of independence. Some time after that an Irishman named O'Reiley, hunting in South Africa, had seen in a hunt a white pebble that pleased his fancy. He put it in his pocket, thinking it was worthless. On his return to London he discovered it was a rare diamond, and sold it for $2,500. That incident caused the greatest interest to be taken in that wild and almost uninhabited country, and, being followed by other discoveries, made England think that all South Africa was valuable. The British Government then, in violation of this treaty and of a similar one with the Orange Free State, claimed dominion over the territory embracing the Kimberley diamond mines, which claim is stated by the English historian Froude as "perhaps the most discreditable page in British colonial history." As a compromise of the claim of the great Government the little Republics ceded to Great Britain for £90,000 the Kimberley mines, which have yielded about $30,000,000 a year.

GREAT BRITAIN'S USURPATION.

The Transvaal Boers had hardships of the severest kind, and wars with the natives that in intensity and ferociousness are indescribable. It was in 1877 that Sir Theophilus Shepstone, Her Majesty's special commissioner for South Africa, arrived at Pretoria. He represented that as the Transvaal State was incapable of withstanding the attacks of the hordes of savage warriors, and as Great Britain would furnish half the money for the suppression of the native tribes, that it would be to the interest of the Transvaal State to come under the protecting care of Her Majesty.

The President of the Transvaal State said he would submit the proposition to his people. An election was held upon the subject, and the proposition was rejected by a vote of over 4 to 1.

Notwithstanding the result of that election, in defiance of the solemn treaty stipulations of Great Britain, without a shadow of right, Sir Theophilus Shepstone, on the 12th day of April, 1877, issued a proclamation declaring the Transvaal State to be British territory from and after that date.

The Boers said the British Government would never approve of such usurpation and appealed to the Queen.

It seems incredible that a nation that is continually boasting of its advanced civilization and progress should have violated every principle of right and justice in the forcible and criminal annexation of the Transvaal. But the proclamation of Sir Theophilus Shepstone was approved by the British Government on the 8th day of November, 1879.

One is apt to doubt the accuracy of such a charge, as it so violently conflicts with right and justice. One is inclined to say surely no such act of oppression has ever been committed by a civilized nation in the nineteenth century. I therefore want to read to you the statement of a man whose word you can not doubt, the statement of England's Grand Old Man, the Right Hon. William E. Gladstone, who for so many years was prime minister of Great Britain.

In a speech in Midlothian in November, 1879, he said:

They [the Conservatives] have annexed in Africa the Transvaal territory, inhabited by a free European Christian republican community, which they have thought proper to bring within the limits of a monarchy, although out of 8,000 persons in that Republic qualified to vote on the subject we are told, and I have never seen the statement officially contradicted, that 6,500 protested against it. These are the circumstances under which we undertake to transform republicans into subjects of a monarchy. * * *

There is no strength to be added to your country by governing the Transvaal. The Transvaal is a country where we have chosen most unwisely—I am tempted to say insanely—to place ourselves in the strange predicament of the free subjects of a monarchy going to coerce the free subjects of a Republic, and to compel them to accept a citizenship which they decline and refuse. But if that is to be done, it must be done by force.

Again, in a speech at Peebles on the 1st day of April, 1880, Mr. Gladstone said:

That is the meaning of adding places like Cyprus and places like the country of the Boers in South Africa to the British Empire. And, moreover, I would say this: If those acquisitions were as valuable as they are valueless, I would repudiate them, because they are obtained by means dishonorable to the character of our country.

Can anyone now doubt that the act of the great British Government in forcibly attempting to annex the little Transvaal State was one of the most diabolical instances of greed and rapacity, of tyranny and usurpation, ever known in the history of the world?

Sir, the Boers determined that they had rather die than stand such oppression and injustice. The little Dutch Republic defied with a courage that is almost unexampled in the history of the world the embattled legions of the British Empire. War followed. The battle of Majuba Hill was fought, where 600 trained British soldiers stationed on the top of a mountain 2,500 feet high were almost annihilated by the attack of 450 burghers and boys from the valley below. The loss of the British was 92 killed, 134 wounded, and 59 prisoners; total, 285. The loss of the Boers was 1 killed and 5 wounded. Surely the Lord was on their side.

They knew, however, that Great Britain by her unlimited resources and strength would ultimately triumph, and in order to save themselves from total annihilation, under duress, entered into a treaty at Pretoria, called the convention of 1881. By that convention she retained absolute freedom and independence, subject to the suzerainty of England, which was defined to mean certain rights as to dealing with the native tribes and foreign powers.

The rights reserved by England are contained in Article II of the treaty, which reads as follows:

ART. II. Her Majesty reserves to herself, her heirs and successors, (a) the right from time to time to appoint a British resident in and for the said State, with such duties and functions as are hereinafter defined; (b) the right to move troops through the said State in time of war, or in case of the apprehension of immediate war between the suzerain power and any foreign State or native tribe in South Africa; and (c) the control of the external relations of the said State, including the conclusion of treaties and the conduct of diplomatic intercourse with foreign powers, such intercourse to be carried on through Her Majesty's diplomatic and consular officers abroad.

Notwithstanding the clear provisions of that treaty as to the rights reserved by England, Joseph Chamberlain, the British secretary of the colonies, now predicates his right to interfere with the internal affairs of that Republic on the ground that the indefinite word "suzerainty" was used in that instrument.

Sir, he can not mystify the minds of those seeking the truth by such an audacious claim. Not only is it groundless from the language of the treaty, but the man under whose administration the treaty was made and ratified has defined the powers reserved by Great Britain, which forever should set at rest such a claim.

Mr. Gladstone in a speech at Leeds in October, 1881, used the following language with respect to this treaty:

Under that convention we felt it our duty to take the best securities for the welfare of those native tribes, counted by hundreds of thousands, who inhabit the Transvaal, and toward whom we could not forget the responsibilities we had assumed. We provided that power should be retained for that purpose. We provided that the Crown should retain prerogatives, under the name of suzerainty, for the purpose of preventing the introduction of foreign embarrassments into South Africa, and we consented freely that, subject to certain minor conditions in relation to money, with which I need not trouble you, the Boers of the Transvaal should in all other respects enjoy perfect self-government and practical freedom and independence.

The Boers, however, feared that word "suzerainty," and almost immediately began negotiations with Great Britain looking to the abrogation of that word and for other changes in the treaty. Paul Kruger and other commissioners of the Transvaal State went to London, and after long negotiations entered into a new treaty with Great Britain, called the convention of 1884, which dropped the "suzerainty," and England retained only the powers conferred in Article IV, which reads as follows:

ART. IV. The South African Republic will conclude no treaty or engagement with any State or nation other than the Orange Free State, nor with any native tribe to the eastward or westward of the Republic, until the same has been approved by Her Majesty the Queen.

Such approval shall be considered to have been granted if Her Majesty's Government shall not, within six months after receiving a copy of such treaty (which shall be delivered to them immediately upon its completion), have notified that the conclusion of such treaty is in conflict with the interests of Great Britain or of any of Her Majesty's possessions in South Africa.

The treaty further provided that—

It is hereby declared that the following articles of a new convention, signed on behalf, etc., * * * shall, when ratified by the Volksraad of the South African Republic, be substituted for the articles embodied in the convention of the 3d of August, 1881; which latter, pending such ratification, shall continue in full force and effect.

The convention of 1884 was duly ratified by the respective governments.

Here is a clear and unequivocal repeal of the convention of 1881, the only one that gave to England the indefinite suzerainty rights referred to.

When the draft of the convention of 1884 was first presented to the Boer deputation, they, on February 4, 1884, wrote to Lord Derby, who at that time was in charge of British affairs, saying that they expected an agreement to be contained in the treaty relative to the abolition of the word suzerainty. In his reply a week later Lord Derby said:

By the omission of those articles of the convention of Pretoria which assigned to Her Majesty and to the British residents certain specific powers and functions connected with the internal government and the foreign relations of the Transvaal State, your government will be left free to govern the country without interference and to conduct its diplomatic intercourse and shape its foreign policy subject only to the requirement embodied in the fourth article of the new draft, that any treaty with a foreign state shall not have effect without the approval of the Queen.

The Boers, in order to remove every semblance of a continuation of old relations, even went so far as to change their name in this treaty from the Transvaal State to the South African Republic. The new name itself is inconsistent with the existence of a superior power.

How can anyone, in view of the express repeal of the convention of 1881, and the clear construction of the new treaty made by the one in authority, before it was signed, have the slightest doubt that every vestige of suzerainty over the Transvaal State was thereby abrogated? No one can, and the British Government did not, as shown by its subsequent conduct. It immediately appointed a diplomatic agent at Pretoria and received at the Court of St. James the minister plenipotentiary of the South African Republic, and these diplomatic officials have represented their respective Governments until the recent commencement of hostilities. No explanation can be made of the subsequent conduct of Great Britain, except that Cecil Rhodes and the stock brokers of London looked with longing eyes at the rich gold mines of the Witwatersrandt and determined that by brute force the little Republic should be hers.

ADMISSIONS OF CHAMBERLAIN.

But, sir, I stated that I would prove by the word of Joseph Chamberlain himself that England had no right to interfere with the internal affairs of the South African Republic, and I will proceed to do it.

Mr. Chamberlain, in a speech delivered in Birmingham on June 7, 1881, speaking of the convention of 1881, said:

I ask your attention, in the first place, to the settlement we have made of the unfortunate war in the Transvaal.

You know that the great majority of the Boer inhabitants of the Transvaal are bitterly opposed to the British rule, and yet we are told that we ought to have persevered in wrongdoing after it was proved that the two grounds upon which the annexation was defended were fallacious and rested on no solid foundation, that we should still force our rule on an unwilling people, whose independence we had solemnly engaged by treaty to respect. * * *

These men settled in the Transvaal in order to escape foreign rule. They left their homes in Natal as the English Puritans left England and went to the United States, and they founded a little Republic of their own in Africa.

In 1853 we made a treaty with them; they agreed to give up slavery and we agreed to respect and to guarantee their independence, and I say under these circumstances is it possible we could maintain a forcible annexation of the country without incurring the accusation of having been guilty, I will not say of national folly, but I say of national crime?

If in 1881 it was a national crime to maintain a forcible annexation of the country, why is it not a national crime now?

Soon after the Jameson raid Mr. Chamberlain, in 1896, in the British Parliament, used the following language:

I do not say that under the terms of the convention we are entitled to force reforms on President Kruger, but we are entitled to give him friendly counsel. If this friendly counsel is not well received, there was not the slightest intention on the part of Her Majesty's Government to press it. I am perfectly willing to withdraw it and to seek a different solution if it should not prove acceptable to the president.

The righteousness of our action under the convention was limited to the offering of friendly counsel, in the rejection of which, if it is not accepted, we must be quite willing to acquiesce.

If the Hon. Joseph Chamberlain in 1896 believed that the right of Great Britain was limited by the convention then in existence to the offering of friendly counsel, with what equity can he now claim that she has the power from the same convention to enforce changes in the laws of that Republic relative to its own internal affairs?

Again, on the 8th day of May, 1896, in Parliament, speaking of the alleged grievances which led to the Jameson raid, Mr. Chamberlain used the following language:

In some quarters the idea is put forward that the Government ought to have issued an ultimatum to President Kruger—an ultimatum which would certainly have been rejected and which must have led to war. Sir, I do not propose to discuss such a contingency as that. A war in South Africa would be one of the most serious wars that could be possibly waged. It would be in the nature of a civil war; it would be a long war, a costly war, a bitter war.

To go to war with President Kruger in order to force upon him reforms in the internal affairs of the state, in which secretaries of state, standing in this place, have repudiated all right of interference on our part; that would be a course of action as immoral as it would be unwise.

If, on the 8th day of May, 1896, it was immoral to force upon the South African Republic reforms as to its internal affairs, why is it not immoral now?

These are the facts relative to the claim of Great Britain that she has a right to interfere in the internal affairs of the South African Republic.

That claim is now made in defiance of the solemn treaty stipulations of that Empire, of the interpretations placed upon those treaties by Lord Derby and the Right Honorable William E. Gladstone, and of the repeated condemnation and repudiation of such power by the present secretary of the colonies.

How can anyone disinterested in this controversy but feel that this is a war of oppression on the part of England and a patriotic, heroic struggle upon the part of the Boers, a brave, honest, God-fearing people?

Should we not at least ask these nations to submit their differences to arbitration? [Applause.]

Mr. LITTLE. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT].

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, it seems that the discussion upon this very important matter has taken a very wide range, and that one member of this House has rather abused that privilege, in my judgment. It seems to me that, as it was once said by the distinguished ex-Speaker of this House, Mr. Reed, every subject between the heavens and the earth has been lugged into this discussion. I believe, sir, that this habit which has been established here of allowing members such a wide range of discussion, even when they are discussing the condition of the Union, has its drawbacks. It seems to me that there ought to be some limit, some restriction put upon them for fear they will lug into these discussions something that ought not to be brought in, especially at a particular time, as has been done during the consideration of this appropriation bill. I mean that there are certain things so irrelevant that they ought not to be brought into exercise at a certain time.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I make no particular objection to the enormous appropriation which is asked for here for the Indians, although it does seem to me sometimes that our efforts to civilize them seem to be futile and I am almost constrained sometimes to say, in the language of another, "I believe that a dead Indian is the best kind of an Indian." I will not, however, take that position, as I believe this Government owes a duty to the Indians as it does to every other subject.

In the exercise of this privilege of general debate, Mr. Chairman, the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY]—and I wish he was in his seat, and I see him coming in—has seen proper to discuss the honor and integrity of the Southern States and to bring in matter that he should not have brought in at this particular time, and he has seen proper here to cast aspersions upon the Southern portion of this great nation.

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that the South needs no vindication at my hands or at the hands of any gentleman upon this side of the House or the other side. The history of this country, past and present, is a sufficient vindication of the South before and since the Revolutionary and all other wars. The history of the South is written with the very best blood that ever flowed in the veins of the human race, and I say, Mr. Chairman, and history will bear me out in that statement, that the South has made this nation what it is to-day. And if this high state of civilization is preserved, I believe it must be done by the statesmanship and talent of the South, as the South has made it what it is to-day.

Mr. Chairman, during the dark days of 1776, when the flag of revolt was flung to the breeze against the black-hearted despotism of Great Britain, it was the South that gave to this nation the sword of the Revolution in the person of George Washington, the Father of his Country—first in war, first in peace, first in the hearts of his countrymen—who, after seven long years of struggle, having but, as it were, a handful of undisciplined yeomanry, triumphed over the enemy and prostrated her at the feet of the American flag and gave us the independence which we enjoy to-day and made this country the superior of any nation upon the face of the earth.

Mr. Chairman, it was the South that gave to this nation the pen of the Revolution, in the person of Thomas Jefferson, who wrote the immortal Declaration of Independence, that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY] and gentlemen upon that side are attempting by their Administration policy to-day to trample under their feet, an effort in which they will not succeed, because it is an immortal idea.

It was the South, Mr. Chairman, that gave to this nation the tongue of the Revolution, in the person of Patrick Henry, who uttered those noble words, "Give me liberty, or give me death." That spirit to-day animates every son of the old and of the new South and will continue to inspire the hearts of her citizens till the end of time. [Applause.]

It was the South that gave to this nation the greatest expounder of the Constitution in Chief Justice Marshall, and it was the South that gave to the nation the greatest reasoner of his day, Mr. J. C. Calhoun, whose disquisition upon that Constitution stands unequaled to-day.

Mr. Chairman, while, as I said, the South needs no vindication at my hands, it comes with ill grace from any man from the North, the East, or the West to enter into a tirade of abuse here against the Southern States. With how much more of ill grace does it come from one of her own sons, a man nurtured and raised at her bosom. Why, Mr. Chairman, it is lamentable, it is disgraceful, that it has been left for one of her own sons to cast a dart of detraction at her fair name, at this late day, in the person of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY]. But suffice it to say that the dart of detraction, coming from that direction, has fallen harmless at the feet of him who cast it, and it will return as a boomerang upon his own head. He will live to rue the day that he has sought to defame the name of his mother.

That distinguished gentleman has taken occasion to lug into this discussion the election laws of the Southern people. I want to say, as far as the election laws of my own State are concerned, that I am willing to have them investigated by every member of this House. Take the constitution of the grand little State of South Carolina, which I have the honor to represent here in part, scrutinize it and criticise it, and I defy you to find anything unfair or discriminating in that instrument. You will find in it only such things as you find in other constitutions of the other great States of this Union.

The gentleman went out of his way to lug into this question a discussion of the question of lynching, which has nothing to do with it, and I say to the gentleman and to every gentleman upon this floor that if you wish to stop lynching in the North, the East, the South, and the West, you must first stop the commission of the crime that causes lynching. For so long as these diabolical crimes are committed, just so long will the rope be used and the perpetrator hanged to the first limb or riddled with bullets or burned at the stake. Remove the cause and the effect will follow.

While I do not approve such methods; while I do not have any apology to make for them; while we all deprecate these conditions, yet I repeat, so long as these crimes are committed just so long will these things occur. And I want to take occasion here to say that we have in the State of South Carolina what is known as the anti-lynching law, by which the legal representatives of a victim of lynch law can recover from the county in which he lives for the injury done them. This shows that in my State we do not countenance lynching, but denounce it. Yet it will happen, and will continue to happen in some cases of this kind, whenever the crime is committed that causes it. In my State whenever a person is denied a vote under the law he has the right of appeal to the courts.

The gentleman had a good deal to say about birds in his discussion yesterday. I wish that he had gone on and told this House what he thought of that bird which would befoul its own nest, and I say he ought to have given you a description of that bird. [Applause.] I want to say that gentlemen may howl, gentlemen may talk as much as they please, but there is one fact in natural history that I want to give you here, and that is that God Almighty never intended that the blackb'rd or the crow should get up to the top of the mountain eyrie where the white eagle lives and raises her brood, and whenever he gets up there and interferes in matters which do not concern him the white eagle will be sure to kill him. It is unnatural for him to be there. You may rest assured that the people of our sunny land will always act worthy of the name of white man, before whose tread the wild Indian, the cunning Asiatic, and the ferocious African alike recede. You may say what you please, but this is a white man's country and a white man's government, and the white people intend to rule it now and forever. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE] occupy some more of his time now?

Mr. LITTLE. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RIDGELY].

[Mr. RIDGELY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] for one hour.

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, I listened yesterday with some surprise to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COONEY], and I have read, as others have, some of the discussions that have occurred at the other end of this Capitol building concerning the policy of territorial enlargement. Though this problem has not at all times been discussed with calmness, yet debate is not altogether fruitless.

Concerning the effects of the policy of expansion even to-day, as in the past, wise men may honestly differ. The attrition of contrary opinions affords us all the blessings of civic liberty enjoyed to-day. The stronger the wind, the less chaff in the wheat; the freer the discussion, the greater certainty that our actions of the present will endure and survive the shocks of a society which is ever ceaseless in motion and progressive in its tendencies.

That there are those whose fears are aroused at a broadening policy in government, that the race of pessimists is powerful, that the brood of political agnostics is large, that the swarm of opportunists in government is omnipresent, by no means is an assurance of their omniscience. Society is largely composed of those who, unable to see the end of their enterprise from the beginning, never venture. Fortune is the handmaid of those who embark, not seeing the far-off market harbor.

Mediævalism may imprison a Gallileo, may jeer at the theories of a Columbus; pessimism, which, living in the caverns of the past, condemns the present and despairs for the future, may stifle the aspirations of Europe for eleven centuries, but can not hold her in perpetual lethargy. For myself, to be happy, for ability to cheer others and render service to my fellows, let me be classified, if you please, an optimist. Let me believe too much rather than not at all. Let me believe that each rising sun warms a better world, shines upon a better condition, and illuminates the pathway of a nobler humanity than its predecessors. Truth surely wins her ground. Truth, as a jewel, was never prized more highly than she was yesterday, until to-day.

More than eighteen centuries since that divine tragedy wherein Truth was pronounced dead, was entombed in a sepulcher before whose door was set a great stone bearing the seal of Imperial Cæsar, which no man might break, Truth and Error had met for mastery; Error proclaimed triumphant, Truth destroyed. Wait until the third day, and you shall see that the divine energy shall have its resurrection morning, its ascension, and its eternal enthronement.

From the Syrian tragedy to the present hour, Truth and Error have met on ten thousand battlefields. Standing close to the contest, Error over and over again has been proclaimed the victor; but after the smoke and dust of battle have lifted you can point to no contest where history does not show Truth intrenched on higher ground and fortified in stronger citadels.

As Christian statesmen you profess belief in the ultimate triumph of freedom. "The truth shall make you free," proclaimed the Gallilean—no one race, one clime, one nation, but freedom, liberty, justice, to the weakest, the humblest of our human race. This nation, most advanced, most enlightened, most Christian, is to be as a city set upon a hill, the light not under the bushel, but upon the candlestick, for the enlightenment of the household of nations.

Permit me to present some balm of consolation for those who counsel with their fears concerning territorial enlargement. We have, since the formation of the Federal Union, annexed the entire territory lying west of the Mississippi River, and while the columns of the press of that day were filled with direful forbodings of disaster, though the Capitol dome has echoed with the thunders of orators in Senate and House until its very rafters have trembled, up to this moment I challenge any member to point out one argument against present expansion which was not as ably presented, as vehemently urged, and more vindictively stated against the Louisiana purchase, certainly against the annexation of Texas.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman say that there is any similarity between the Philippine Islands and the Territories of Louisiana and Texas, or between the people of the State of Missouri at the time of the Louisiana purchase?

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Missouri that I will not characterize, but I will print with my remarks an appendix of what was said about the people in Missouri. You were classed as barbarians in the debates of that hour. I am going to read from some of the debates if my time permits. I have spent several weeks in going through the Globe and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I say that you will not find one argument that has been presented on the floor of this House that was not presented then.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Are the Philippine Islands available for occupation by Americans?

Mr. SIBLEY. They told you at the time that the territory west of the Mississippi River was not available for occupation.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Is it not true that the Philippine Islands are not available for occupation by Americans?

Mr. SIBLEY. On what account? Because of its distance?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. On account of its dense population.

Mr. SIBLEY. Does the gentleman believe that the nation can acquire territory not adjacent?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SIBLEY. Without any disrespect, I want to tell the gentleman a story.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman please answer the question: Does he think the Philippine Islands are accessible to American immigration?

Mr. SIBLEY. I will answer that when I get to it in my remarks. I want to tell the gentleman a story. It seems to me that you gentlemen are in the position of an old man who lived up in my country at the time they built the Allegheny Valley Railroad. He had some flat land in a valley where they wanted to build the road. He was opposed to railroads, never having seen one of them. Under the right of eminent domain they built the road, and, after it was built, he and his wife concluded that they would go over and see the train pass by.

They got on the top of a hill; as a long freight train came around the curve and swept down the valley they watched it until it went out of sight; and then she turned to him and said, "Well, Josiah, it didn't do no harm." He said, "Maria, that is all right; this time she went endwise, but the next time she may come sidewise, and there won't be a crap left in the whole of wire-grass region." [Laughter.] You people are afraid that the next time it is going to come sidewise, but it is going to come endwise, just as it has always done. [Laughter.]

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I wish the gentleman would answer my question, whether the Philippine Islands are suitable for American occupation.

Mr. SIBLEY. I will say to my friend that I think they are, but I will come to that a little further on in my remarks. I want to say that up to this time I have read no argument against the present territorial enlargement that was not as ably presented, and more vindictively presented, against the annexation of Texas and against the purchase of Louisiana. In 1803 Mr. Jefferson purchased for $15,000,000 that territory which extended the length of the Mississippi River and was restrained in its western limits ultimately by the waters of the Pacific alone.

For this purchase the stock of calumny, contumely, epithet, and vituperation was so largely drawn upon as to leave New England almost bankrupt in those articles before the final acquisition of the territory that came to us from the war with Mexico. They charged Mr. Jefferson with seeking imperial powers. He was denounced as a perverter of government, a trampler upon that Constitution that he had helped to create.

The Federalists urged that this territory was being acquired in derogation of the rights of the States comprising the Federal Union and if the Clerk were to commence reading now the denunciations of Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Tyler, and Mr. Polk, and Mr. Madison, the time of this body would expire by constitutional limitation before he could complete his work.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him by reading an extract from his speech made in August, 1893?

Mr. SIBLEY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I must decline to yield. What I said there I stated from my heart, and if you want to read it, go ahead; but before you do that I will ask to have my time extended fifteen minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Speaking of Thomas Jefferson, the gentleman said——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent of the House that his time be extended fifteen minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I must object, because the time is limited and has been allotted.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SIBLEY. I can not get an extension of my time, and I will have to decline to yield.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. I hope that the gentleman may be permitted to conclude his remarks. He has been interrupted several times when he has said that he did not want to be.

Mr. LITTLE. I will yield three minutes of my time to permit the gentleman from Texas to read the part of the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he refers to.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I read only a few sentences from the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. In referring to Mr. Jefferson, he said:

> Thomas Jefferson once wrote, "I can scarcely withhold myself from joining in the wish of Silas Deane, that an ocean of fire roll between the Old World and this." Why, how that utterance would make some of our modern anglomaniac statesmen jump!

Then, again, he says:

> Mr. Speaker, I stand by the Democracy of the old fathers of the Republic. I stand by the men whose voices have been raised always for human liberty; a Democracy that has regard to the cries of the suffering that have been heard in this land in all of its decades and history.

[Laughter on the Democratic side and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SIBLEY. I thank my friend from Texas most heartily. Where I stood then is where I stand to-day, and where, in the providence of God, I will stand at the finish. [Renewed applause.]

The pessimists of that day urged that it had taken society one hundred and seventy-five years to move from Plymouth Rock, in sparse settlements, to the Ohio River, and that the infinite ages would see this new and savage territory useless, uninhabited, and uninhabitable.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Does the gentleman think that the people of the Philippine Islands are susceptible of the same degree of enlightenment that has been attained by the people of the great Louisiana purchase?

Mr. SIBLEY. My dear friend, we are coming to a higher estimate of some of the people embraced in the Philippines than was held concerning the people in the territory lying west of the Mississippi River. Let me read the remarks—not my own, but those of Federalists of that day——

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The gentleman does not answer

my question. Does he believe that the people of the Philippine Islands are capable to the same extent of civilization and enlightenment as those who were embraced in the Louisiana purchase?

Mr. SIBLEY. Sir, I am not placing limitations on the power of Almighty God to carry out a work according to His sovereign will. [Applause.]

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Then the gentleman admits that it will require Almighty power to work out this transformation and that it can not be done under ordinary conditions.

Mr. SIBLEY. I am willing to let the wisdom of this House and the Administration determine this question.

Mr. Chairman, if I had unlimited time, I would like to enter into a critical discussion with these gentlemen. But I want to present some of the arguments that were made against territorial expansion in those days. I wish to find, if I can, one new argument presented at the present time against the enlargement of our territory.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Was it contended at that time that the people embraced within the Louisiana purchase were, like those of the Philippine Islands, inhabitants of a country 10,000 miles distant from this capital?

Mr. SIBLEY. Well, my friend, I will answer you in just a moment. I wish to take a few of those arguments presented at a former day; and the gentleman will see that they are the same objections you now offer. Did the friends of Jefferson urge the productive capabilities of the Louisiana purchase and its great stores of mineral wealth? Lo, they were met with infinite jests concerning salt mountains! They urged that these people were aliens to our race, our manners, our language, and our creed—a mixture of Spanish, French, Italians, negroes, half-breeds, and Indians.

It was charged that Mr. Jefferson was entailing a legacy of woe—was ruining the country.

Upon the floor of this House was made the first threat of secession, when in 1811 it was proposed to admit the newly formed State of Louisiana to the sisterhood of States.

Louisiana was purchased, Louisiana was annexed, in spite of the Federal warnings and threats which were hurled upon Jefferson and Madison from 1803 to 1812. Looking, as we do, at the wrong side of the pattern, at the under side of the web and woof of life, where amid tangled threads we work out unconsciously, ofttimes in doubt, our little part, Providence, which guides the destiny of men and nations, eternally viewing the right side of the pattern, and the end from the beginning, makes no mistakes, and shows to future generations the finished achievement.

Our flag floats to-day over the Louisiana territory, and who would haul it down?

The passing of but one generation was necessary to convince the Federalists of the wisdom of Jefferson. In those days the Federalists were Bourbons. They learned nothing and forgot nothing, and so without surprise we find them, under the name of Whigs, opposing the annexation of Texas, perhaps with juster reasons, but with venom one hundred times distilled and condensed.

Webster and Clay massed their powers of oratory in denunciation and forebodings. Charles Sumner declared that this was a war of conquest, and stated: "In this age there can be no peace which is not honorable and no war which is not dishonorable." Truly for some ideal state of civilization in the future a noble sentiment, but one which the stern events of the sixties compelled him greatly to modify.

Tyler and Polk, urged on by Jackson, speaking almost from the portals of his tomb, went forward and were denounced as red-handed murderers. The Whigs proclaimed from pulpit, press, and platform that this war was being waged against Mexico to the end that there might be wider limits on God's fair earth wherein the master could manacle the limbs and lash the back of his fellow-man. That war, whatever may have been the evil designs of its promoters, was under God's providence overruled to the welfare of the nation and our common humanity. It gave us Texas, California, Arizona, New Mexico, Nevada, Utah, and the larger portion of Colorado. From which one would an American haul down our flag?

Another generation passes and Democratic wisdom is again justified in the acquisition of this territory from Mexico. Annexation of territory has always been Democratic policy. It was the policy of Jefferson and Madison, of Jackson and Tyler and Polk. It was submitted to Congress by President Buchanan in his message to Congress in 1858, and in his last message to Congress, that we should purchase, control, and govern Cuba.

It was wisdom at that day, even if emanating from earthen vessels of common clay. Speaking from the White House in 1861, in response to a serenade, we have the last public utterance of President Buchanan, when he said, "Expansion is in future the policy of our country, and only cowards fear and oppose it." He was the last Democratic President we ever had and this was his last public utterance. [Great laughter.]

In 1867 Secretary Seward purchased Alaska from Russia for $7,200,000. So unmercifully was the Administration jeered and guyed for purchasing icebergs and snowbanks, where even the lowest type of the human family could barely exist, that the friends of the Administration of President Johnson sought to hush the critics by assigning as the reason for such purchase the desire, in a most delicate manner, to reward Russia for her friendship in the struggle against disunion. Another generation has rolled around, and expansion is again justified. Who would haul down the flag which floats over the frozen wastes of Alaska?

Why, sir, during the past year we have been wrangling with Canada, and would almost tread the very verge of war before we would consider any proposition looking to the surrender of a strip of disputed boundary something like 25 miles in width. Surely, Mr. Chairman, those who counsel with their fears to-day have history to show how groundless their forebodings that freemen in the enlargement of the boundaries where civic blessings may flow stand upon other than foundations which reach to the eternal granite of Truth.

Let me briefly answer some objectors and objections. First, that we can not purchase sovereignty. We purchased sovereignty in the following States and Territories: Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, Iowa, Minnesota, North and South Dakota, Washington, Oregon, Montana, Idaho, Wyoming, a part of Colorado, Oklahoma, Indian Territory, and Florida.

The second objection is that you can not conquer sovereignty. We conquered sovereignty in Texas, California, Nevada, Utah, Colorado, New Mexico, and Arizona. Sir, sovereignty by conquest is the history of every nation from the dawn of antiquity.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. The gentleman will not contend that we conquered sovereignty in Texas.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I was about to ask whether the gentleman will contend that Texas was conquered by the United States. Does he take that position?

Mr. SIBLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman Yankee fashion another question. How did Texas get away from the control of Mexico, if it was not by force of arms?

Mr. COOPER of Texas. But it was not a part of the Union at that time.

Mr. SIBLEY. Very true; but that was the beginning of the train of events that led to our getting that territory.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Did not Texas achieve her own independence?

Mr. SIBLEY. Oh, yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Was she not a republic ten years before she was annexed to the United States?

Mr. SIBLEY. If the Committee of the Whole will agree to extend my time indefinitely, I will yield to all these gentlemen.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, as the Chair understands, declines to yield further.

Mr. SIBLEY. We wrested from the red man the lands of this nation, even as William the Norman conquered sovereignty in Britain. We, as the Lord's anointed, acquired territory in America as God's anointed, the seed of Abraham, acquired it in Palestine—in all the progression of history invariably the higher and better type replacing the inferior.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. May I ask one more question?

Mr. SIBLEY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I shall not be able to make my speech if I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman advocate——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania declines to yield.

Mr. SIBLEY. I should willingly do so if I had the time.

Third, the paragraph from the immortal Declaration that "All governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed." This is in a broad sense a noble declaration, but in a narrow and perverted sense a commonplace platitude. In our own free Republic government, just or unjust, derives its consent to govern from less than 10 per cent of the governed.

At the last general election no one party had more than a bare majority of all the votes. The voters are numerically but one-fifth of the population; so, in fact, as a mathematical demonstration, the present Administration governs by the will of one-half of one-fifth part of those to be governed. We deny to 15,000,000 of intelligent women any right to consent or dissent; and then we quarrel over the creation of free institutions for the improvement of less than 2,000,000 of male Filipinos.

Fourth objection. While palliating the acquisition of territory in the past, you cite that it was proper because contiguous territory. Sir, what is contiguous territory? When we acquired Louisiana the record from Boston to this capital city was fifty-five hours; from Pittsburg to Washington, four days in a stage-coach over a range of mountains; from Washington to St. Louis, three weeks; from Washington overland to the western limits of the Louisiana purchase, so far that no citizen of the United States had ever lived long enough to go there and come back alive. [Applause.]

Speak of contiguous territory, when to reach the State of California only thirty years ago took months of time and involved innumerable hardships. Modern science has annihilated time and distance. To-day we hold audible converse with our Pacific friends as plainly as if they lived in the adjoining room. Contiguous territory! The lightning flashes our message to Manila, and in an hour we know the thought of the Antipodes, if that thought is worthy the transmission.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. That is, if the censor will let it come.

Mr. SIBLEY. More and more as God reveals his secrets to the modern scientists, yesterday shall be as eternity and to-morrow infinity. You raise your hands in horror and howl about shooting freedom into people. Nevertheless, you know as well as myself that freedom and liberty in every land and in every age has been established and maintained by spear, sword, and bayonet.

Mr. COX. Oh!

Mr. SIBLEY. Well, cite your instances. You lament the fact that in order to establish stable government in the Philippine Archipelago it was necessary for the armed forces of the United States with bayonet and bullet to shed the blood of revolting Filipinos. You deplore this fact not more than myself; but my belief is that no other honorable course was open to us in the plain discharge of our duty to maintain order and protect the rights of life and property.

From the moment of the ratification of the treaty with Spain it was an obligation sacred in its character, and for which we were answerable not alone to our citizens, but to the civilized governments of the entire world. [Applause.] The Word of God declares and all history demonstrates the correctness of the assertion that "Without the shedding of blood there is no remission of sin."

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. What sin have the Filipinos committed that we should kill them?

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. SIBLEY. Each conquest of freedom, each triumph of humanity, each step in the onward progress of the race may be tracked by blood.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Is that a recommendation for it?

Mr. SIBLEY. Wendell Phillips once declared that each achievement of human justice had been from rack to rack and from scaffold to scaffold. And yet I believe that, through arbitration and in the wider recognition of the rights of others, there has been shed less human blood in the last twenty-five years than was shed in any single year prior thereto during the long centuries from the dawn of history.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. What great power ever arbitrated with a weak one?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not in order.

Mr. SIBLEY. Shall we keep the Philippine Archipelago and Puerto Rico? Every foot! No nation on the globe has higher rights or better title to a rod of soil. We hold by a double claim—the right of conquest and the right of purchase. My belief is that where once our banner's shadow has fallen, there will survive a race of freemen. And I should hold Cuba until stability, order, the protection of life, property, and good government were assured.

And again I echo the President's query, "Who would haul down the flag?" Who planted it there? What Cabinet council? What warrior? What statesman? What Senator or Representative? What body of men framed any plan of conquest? The cries of suffering humanity, ground down beneath the iron heel of oppression rang, in our ears, and we stopped our ears. Their groans were heard, but we answered not. We saw them stripped and wounded on our way to Jericho, and like the priest and Levite passed by on the other side. Not unheard at the throne of heaven were those groans and prayers.

In order to awaken us from our torpor and almost criminal indifference the Almighty permitted the engines of His wrath to hurtle their thunderbolts under the bows of the Maine lying peacefully at anchor in Habana Harbor. Nor keenest sighted statesman nor most daring warrior had even contemplated the possibility of gain, growth, or greatness to us as a nation to come out of the war of which the blowing up of the Maine was the first declaration.

These lands and people, unworthily ruled, were, in the wisdom of the Almighty, to pass from the house of Saul to that of David. God and the valor of American arms gave us this territory, not because we are a nation altogether free, altogether pure and blameless, but because, working through human instrumentalities, He has given it to the boldest, freest, most progressive, most enlightened, and most Christian of all the nations of the present age. [Applause.]

Sir, I am an optimist. My belief is that on this continent God has willed to plant a people who shall carry the arts of peace and the story of the cross to the nations of the earth. You deprecate war not more than myself; but, sir, under certain conditions war is to the body politic what the plowshare is to the husbandman. Noxious growths, thorns and briars must be uprooted and exterminated, that in the mellowed mold the fairer fruitage may develop.

Within the bosom of our soil the Almighty has stored, through countless ages, the treasuries of mineral. From her breast, clad with forests and golden with ripening harvests, He will house and feed a race which will hasten the dawn of that morning when through a thousand cycles war shall be banished, the swords beat into plowshares and the spears into pruning hooks, and men, until time shall be no more, shall look into the eyes of each other and recognize the bonds of brotherhood. We go forth as a nation, not to teach the doctrine of the survival of the fittest, but to make men fit to survive.

Do gentlemen recognize the fact that in one hundred years from to-day this will be a nation of 400,000,000 souls? With such a soil, with such material resources, and with such a people, who would haul down the flag from enlarged boundaries? Who would environ and stifle between two oceans the energies of such a civilization? Who would pent up its powers within the confines of a continent?

This race of American citizens which we so incorrectly term Anglo-Saxon is something more than Anglo-Saxon. This mighty river of civilization, it is true, is Anglo-Saxon in its source at Plymouth, but strengthened and reenforced in all its flow, here by the Celt, here by the Teuton, here by the Gaul, here by the Latin, here by the Norseman, here by the Hebrew, the bold, the hardy, the venturesome, the liberty-loving and truth-seeking of every clime and creed, who abhorring oppression, loving freedom, expatriated themselves from thrones, and, casting their lot with us, have been grafted upon native Anglo-Saxon stock and produced such a civilization as this round world has never known before.

Travel with me through Europe and you will easily find the typical Irishman; you will point out to me the typical Briton, German, Frenchman, Italian, or Oriental, but point out any man to me, if you can, upon this American continent and say this man is the true physical type of the American. We have almost as many types as we have individuals. This genius, summoned from the four quarters of the globe, shall make America not alone the exemplar and the pattern, but the workshop which shall fabricate the necessities of humanity regardless of territorial limitation.

With every drop of blood bounding in my pulses Puritan, without one outcross in my lineage from those who landed among the very earliest with the Pilgrim Fathers upon New England's soil, revering the grand traits which have made her sons preeminent, nevertheless my eyes are open to read history and my senses quick to draw lessons which teach me that as the Pilgrim Fathers improved with transplanting from English soil to Plymouth and Salem, so the sons of New England transplanted to our own West and South have been given a wider horizon and have broadened with that horizon.

In this generation the nation shall be as unwisely guided in her destinies touching territorial expansion by the senior Senator from Massachusetts, grand old philanthropist though he be, as she was by Pickering, Quincy, Webster, and Sumner from 1803 to 1850.

Great statesmen and philanthropists have been wrong in the past, and some of them lived to see how groundless were their forebodings. Those men loved their country and gloried in her institutions, but were wrong. And so to-day we may charitably believe that wise and patriotic men may differ from us, having fallen into the same errors as misled the illustrious men of the past.

Frame a suitable subsidy bill for the encouragement of our merchant marine, afford to American commerce but the tithe of opportunity that is given by all the maritime nations of the world to their commerce, build the Isthmian Canal, and we shall in time not only bridge the Atlantic with ships, but shall bridge the Pacific to the Orient and the furthermost isles of the sea.

Build the Pacific canal, permit the cheapening of rates in freight on goods that will not at present bear railway transportation charges, and you will make the Pacific slope the counterpart of our Atlantic seaboard. Is this canal to be opposed by those who fear it will destroy or injure their transcontinental railway lines? In my judgment it will multiply their traffic tenfold. The Erie Canal has built up and established enterprises along the line of that canal which make the New York Central one of the most valuable railroad properties in the world.

The conversion of the Monongahela River into a waterway for commerce destroyed no railroad property investments, but has multiplied their value many-fold, and that valley of Pennsylvania to-day is so filled with factories and railroads as not to leave room for the construction of others to relieve the congested traffic. Build the Isthmian Canal, control thereby the entire trade of the west coast of South America; control the Philippine Archipelago, and the Gulf States will rival the commercial greatness of the most favored States of the North.

Tennessee and Alabama will bear the same relation to the trade of South America and the Orient in their products of iron and steel as is borne by Pennsylvania and Ohio to our domestic and European trade to-day. South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Louisiana, and Texas will rival the New England of to-day in manufacturing and commerce.

Mr. COX. We will take care of the South.

Mr. SIBLEY. Take Mercatore's "Projection of the Map of the World," view the position of the States of the Gulf in relation to the canal, view our Pacific ports moved 10,000 miles nearer to our doors; enlarge your vision, and let it sweep from the Pacific coast to Hawaii and the Philippine Archipelago; study the capabilities of production of those islands under humane government; witness her products, of such diversified nature and of such value, not coming in competition with the products of our American husbandman, as will start our looms and spindles and stimulate industry in all our factories; study her harbors, from which a Dewey professes his ability to meet the navies of the world; look at the geographical position of this archipelago in relation to the Straits Settlements, with their teeming millions, situated just to the south of China and Japan and Korea, this archipelago becomes the trade center of the eastern world.

The world's trade is the trade of the Orient. The Chinese wall of exclusiveness is being demolished, and 450,000,000 people of China, with their multiplied wants, which American production and industry must rightfully supply, will clamor for our products. Not in Europe, with its manufacturing industries already established, will we find the outlet for the fabrications of American genius, but rather in Japan, the Straits Settlements, Korea, eastern Russia, and China, possessing, as they do, the accumulated wealth of more than four thousand years, will come the demand for American products of our workshops and cotton fields.

In the Orient is the market for every pound and bushel of our surplus of wheat and corn and cotton. In the grand harbors of the Philippine Archipelago will be assembled their products, brought from the isles of the Orient and the mainland in the junks and proas, and thence distributed by American commerce to the markets of the world. It is a safe prediction now to make that Manila is destined to become the chief commercial metropolis of the Orient. Her geographical position alone entitles her to this rank.

Given American genius in control of her commerce, and who shall estimate her value to the world? Already Russia, who holds more than one-sixth of the entire area of the earth, is moving eastward through northern China. The President has declared, and we must maintain, that in this great breaking up of the Chinese Empire the United States, under each and every circumstance, shall enjoy the right to compete on terms of equality with every other nation on the globe. Politicians may content themselves with narrow views of the present, but it is the province of statesmen, while observing the present, to take long looks into the future as well. Within the lifetime of gentlemen on this floor this will be a nation of more than 200,000,000 souls.

In the period no longer than has elapsed since Jefferson's statesmanship was vindicated in the purchase of Louisiana 400,000,000 people will be living in our present boundaries. Do you fear to look twenty-five, fifty, or one hundred years ahead? A long time, true, in the life of a man, but only a speck, I trust, in the life of this nation.

Should the Administration surrender this territory and the advantages it secures to America, the historian of the future will write it down as one of the most pusilanimous Administrations that had ever control of national events. Shall we eternally take counsel with our fears? Shall we play the rôle of opportunists in politics? Shall we act the part of politicians on issues of such tremendous consequence? No! No! Let us rather set our faces toward the morning and keep step with the forward progress of the world. A party, no more than an individual, will never win success, nor even deserve it, by any policy of mere negation. No man or party wins success, or should, by merely pointing out the mistakes of others.

We have forgotten the name of a single one of the horde of critics of Paradise Lost, but we remember well that its author was John Milton. We recall the fact that Watt invented the steam engine. We have forgotten, or never cared to know, the names of the multitudes of men who have wrecked steam engines. Primitive man lived incaverns, clothed himself in skins, and ate his meat raw, sitting on his haunches, and there has never occurred a change for the higher and better forms of life without arousing the hostility of some old mossback, conservative hunker, who will prate of those fairer and better days of old, when their grandfathers swung by their tails from the limbs of the trees in the wilds of the forest primeval. [Great laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, we have held up to us for warning the history of Persia and Greece, of Babylon and Rome. They have flourished and have faded. They had their morning hour and their meridian and went out in the blackness of night. Rome expanded until, like a wheel, the spokes radiated from the hub throughout Europe, Asia, and Africa. The collapse of her power and of every empire of the past came, not from the weakness of the periphery of the wheel, but from the rottenness of the hub.

Rome fought for spoils and booty, and all the loot of war,
The talons of her eagles ever left the cankering scar,
Her consuls led her legions forth with sword, and scourge, and chain;
And captives reel at the chariot wheel when home they come again.

Not for spoils and booty, not for the loot of war,
Not for a train of captives chained to the conqueror's car,
Our nation sends her legions forth, far out across the sea,
With her starry emblem floating, proclaiming all men free.

[Applause.]

We go forth with the plowshare and the pruning hook; with the Bible and the spelling book. From the jungle and from the hilltops will float the banner of freedom over countless schoolhouses; we go to lift up cellar hatchways and let out fetid poisons and miasmatic vapors; we go forth not to pillage temples, but to erect them; not to stifle liberty, but to give nobler ideals of liberty; not to forge fetters, but to break them. [Applause.]

History finds man first in Asia, from which the human family have emigrated to the westward until they have circled the globe, and to-day the new civilization clasps hands at Manila with the ancient.

Mother Asia, we stand at your threshold. In a far, immemorial yore
We left thee, great mother of nations, and now we return to your door.
We have circled the seas and their islands, we have found us new worlds in the main;
We have found us young brides o'er the alien tides; now we come to our mother again.
We wandered through ages unnumbered, we were mad with the fever to roam;
But the new flag that floats at Manila proclaims that your sons have come home.
They come with the wealth of their wand'rings, they come in the strength of their pride;
Now, old mother, arise, lift up your dim eyes, and behold your strong sons at your side.
There are weeds in the gardens of morning, there are mildew and dearth and decay,
And your blind days are drear, and your heart has grown sore, in the years that your sons were away.
But lift your old eyes to the seaward, where the flag of the West is discerned;
Be glad, gray old mother of nations—the youth of the world has returned.
They will toil in your gardens of morning, they will cleanse you of mire and of fen;
You shall hear the glad laughter of children, you shall see the strong arms of young men.
New hope shall come back to your borders, despair from your threshold be spurned.
A new day shall rise in your Orient skies—the youth of the world has returned.

[Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, every dictate of prudence and of statesmanship, every dictate of business sense and of commercial advantage, every dictate of reason, every prompting of humanity, and every obligation of applied Christianity unite in the demand that we go forward. [Applause.] We have a mission to perform; a destiny to accomplish; an example to be given of how nations may justly rule themselves, not in license but in liberty. Nor shall that mission be finished, or that destiny be fully accomplished, until—

The war drums beat no longer,
And the battle flags are furled
In the parliament of man—
The federation of the world.

Shall we falter in our duty? Shall we haul down that flag whose waving stripes speak the white of purity and the red of sacrifice, and whose shining stars stand in the field of blue as an aspiration and an inspiration for all that is noble in life and beneficent in government? No! Let it float! And under its shadows—

Shall brothers be knit in closer bands
From the mountain's crest to the gray sea sands,
And the world be better, I ween.

APPENDIX.

James G. Blaine, in Volume I, page 7, Twenty Years of Congress, said:

It seems scarcely credible that the acquisition of Louisiana by Jefferson was denounced with a bitterness surpassing the partisan rancor with which later generations have been familiar. No abuse was too malignant, no epithet too coarse, no imprecation too savage, to be employed by the assailants of the great philosophic statesman who laid so broad and deep the foundations of his country's growth and grandeur. President of a feeble Republic, contending for a prize which was held by the greatest military power of Europe, and whose possession was coveted by the greatest naval power of the world, etc.

Mr. Chairman, as showing some of the opinions entertained by the wise men of that day, opposed to the policy of expansion, when the acquirement of Louisiana was under consideration, I shall quote from the Congressional Globe. Mr. Griswold, on page 434:

It is not consistent with the spirit of republican government that this territory should be exceedingly large.

Mr. Lewis, on page 441, declares the measure unconstitutional.

Mr. Thatcher, on page 445, states:

It will involve the necessity of a considerable standing army.

Mr. Lucas, on page 1061:

Without wishing to reflect upon the inhabitants of Louisiana, I would say they are not prepared for a government like that of the United States.

In the Twenty-eighth Congress of the United States, second session, Volume XIV, page 177, Mr. Pollock says:

The wilds of the West alone would provide a home for millions for ages yet to come. I say we need no more territory.

Speaking of Texas, Senator Marshall, on page 281 of the second session Twenty-eighth Congress, states:

Let gentlemen pursue their doctrine to its consequences. If Congress can annex Texas, it can annex any other foreign territory. We are venturing on dangerous ground, and it trembles beneath our feet. If Texas, why not Cuba, if she come demanding admission with the assent of the Spanish Government?

To which Mr. Buchanan retorted:

I wish she would.

Senator Morehead, upon page 282, says:

Rome, after corrupting the purity of primitive institutions, became ambitious, next omnipotent, then luxurious, and at last perished under the weight of her provincial acquisitions.

In Volume XIII, Twenty-eighth Congress, first session, Joshua R. Giddings, of Ohio, says:

I for one deny the constitutional power of this Government to amalgamate the political destinies of this people with those of Texas or any other foreign Government.

On page 445 of the same volume is printed a letter from Andrew Jackson favoring the annexation of Texas and the enlargement of her boundaries.

In Volume XVI, first session Twenty-ninth Congress, Mr. Ashmund, of Massachusetts, denounces it as a war of conquest and views it as an omen of premature decay of our institutions.

Mr. Gentry, of Tennessee, Volume XVII, page 47, says:

The President is going to conquer a vast region of country, larger than all the thirteen States, and add it to the Union. Surely people must be mad if they shut their eyes to the bearing of such a resolution. They were bound to anticipate the dangers which threatened them and to call the people to the rescue. Their dearest interests are about to be put in peril by fools and traitors.

Volume XVII, second session Twenty-ninth Congress, page 546, Senator Pearce, of Maryland, said:

I want no more annexation. I want no more partnership with outside barbarians.

Certainly the gentleman was not at that time very complimentary to our friends from Texas, Arizona, New Mexico, California, Nevada, and Colorado.

Daniel Webster says, Volume XVII, second session Twenty-ninth Congress, page 156:

For one I enter into this declaration with all my heart. We want no extension of territory; we want no accession of new States. The country is already large enough. From the first I saw, and have seen, nothing but the danger to arise to the country from such annexation. We appear to me to be rushing upon perils headlong and with our eyes all open, but I put my trust in Providence and in that good sense and patriotism of the people which will yet, I hope, arouse themselves before it is too late.

Volume XVI, first session Twenty-ninth Congress, Joshua R. Giddings, of Ohio, said:

It is for these reasons that I have characterized the annexation of Texas as a dissolution of the Union. Whether this language be appropriate I leave for those who hear me to determine. I will not contend about terms.

McMaster's History, page 198, Volume III:

Never was the Constitution more broadly construed than when the judiciary act was repealed and the purchase of Louisiana effected. Never was the Executive power more extended than when Jefferson was given despotic sway over the Territory of New Orleans. Never was the Constitution more impudently disregarded than on the day when one rate of tonnage duty was laid in the ports of Louisiana and a very different one in the ports of the States. The great mass of the men who in 1800 voted for Adams could in 1804 see no reason whatever for voting against Jefferson.

Schouler's History, Volume II, page 250:

Already New Orleans was developing into the grand international mart and exchange for cotton, sugar, and productions from up the river which it has ever since remained; its business excitements seasoned by dissolute pleasure; its morals and public virtue soft and yielding; its inhabitants lavish and fond of gaudy shows, but not given to the interchange of elevated thought, and the whole unhealthy social fabric seeming to rest, like its houses and tombs, the receptacles of dead and living, upon surface foundations and behind levees, as though to defy the deluge. In this babel of tongues—English, French, German, Spanish, and Italian—French was still as familiar as English. Perhaps the most powerful American influence exerted by this singular cosmopolite city has been in transmitting to neighboring States in a perfected code the jurisprudence and institutions which Louisiana and Spanish America derived from imperial Rome.

Schouler's History, page 314, Volume II:

The curious medley of races and morals which New Orleans at this time afforded raised no prejudice against admitting Louisiana to the full sisterhood of States. The Eastern Federalists cherished deeper dislike. Brought now to confront the new and inevitable expansion of the American Union beyond the Mississippi, their pent-up jealousy broke out into anger. The new census showed a rapid development of the population beyond the Alleghenies, where their political camp fires could never kindle. It seemed as if New England's scepter and commerce were departing together. From this point is manifested a decided antipathy at the East to slavery expansion and growth in the southwest, whose origin, so far as concerns Pickering, Quincy, and the old-school leaders of that section, must be ascribed more to political than humane convictions, however clear might have been the later flame.

Quincy's speech against erecting any State beyond the Mississippi upon the present basis of the Union was very violent. "If this bill passes," he exclaimed, in passionate strain, after dwelling upon the constitutional objection to admitting Louisiana, "it is my deliberate opinion that it is virtually a dissolution of the Union, that it will free the States from their moral obligation; and as it will be the right of all, so it will be the duty of some, definitely to prepare for a separation, amicably if we can, forcibly if they must." Loud cries interrupted him of "Order! Order!" and his words were taken down. Speaker Varnum rule the latter portion of these remarks out of order, but the ruling was reversed by the House, and Quincy continued more calmly.

This speech forcibly illustrates the position of the eastern Federalists at that day. The statement which so startled the House had been uttered, as Quincy explained, "Not for agitation, but as a warning; not from hostility to the Union, but out of an earnest desire to preserve it." The clause in the Constitution authorizing the admission of new States must, from the context, be understood to relate only to the formation of the new States within the limits of the Union then existing. The people of that day had no idea of the territorial avidity of their successors. The prevailing opinion then was that the country was already too extensive for a republican form of government. Nowadays there is no limit to our ambitious hopes. We are about to cross the Mississippi; the Missouri and the Red River are but roads upon which our immigration travels to new lands and new States, to be erected and admitted under a power now about to be usurped.—Annals of Congress, January 14, 15, 1811.

"Quincy, still young in the service, survived all his political contemporaries. He lived long enough to recant these narrow views and to see and believe in the uprising of a great people, stretched from ocean to ocean, with one thought and one will to protect, preserve, and to render the union of these States immortal."—From a speech made in 1861, Quincy's Life, Lossing's War of 1812, 228.

Annals of Congress:

Pickering did not claim that he violated confidence through inadvertence, but defended only as though the violation was of no present consequence. His colleague undertook to soften the resolution by inserting the word "unintentional," but upon Clay's intimation that he would move to amend further by striking out "un," withdrew the amendment.

Schouler's History, Volume II, page 429:

Was this political strategy in order to teach the American nation to look up to Federalism as the brazen serpent, or was it New England's serious ultimatum to her sister States? From whichever point it should be regarded, never did amiable gentlemen of the bar fall more ignominiously as confidential advisers of a rebellion. An uprising of shipping merchants, clergy, and moneyed men could scarcely have been heroic or popular; and the conventionists, moreover, had duly estimated neither the weariness of governments abroad nor the reserved strength of their own.

Before Congress, now in session, had actually resorted to a conscription, before new and burdensome taxes could be assessed or a national bank chartered, while the novel experiment of enrolling State volunteers promised all the troops immediately desired, the war cloud suddenly parted. Massachusetts and Connecticut had accepted the report of the Hartford convention; each dispatched ministers to Washington to make upon Congress the proposed demand for a separate maintenance.

Quickly, indeed, but too late. Those demands were never made, for before the State commissioners could reach the national capital salutes were firing and the Stars and Stripes floated free. The vast area of our indivisable Union was becoming spangled by night with illuminations. Almost simultaneously came the good news to Washington that Jackson had driven the British from New Orleans and that our commissioners abroad had concluded an honorable peace at Ghent on the 24th of December.

McMaster's History, Volume III, page 194:

The Federalists controlled the clergy and the press and summoned to their aid every charge which for four years past had been going the rounds of the newspapers. The old cries of French influence, ruin of the Army, ruin of the Navy, ruin of the judiciary, persecution of the Federalists, Virginia rule, taxation in New England were heard again. God-fearing men were reminded of Jefferson's friendship for Thomas Paine. The shipwrights, the blacksmiths, the whitesmiths, the pump makers, the block makers, the pewterers, the coopers, and riggers were reminded of his hatred of mechanics and of his wish that our workshops might remain in Europe.

Taxpayers were bidden to recall the frightful extravagance of the Administration, the great sums squandered in sending Republicans abroad to replace Federalists at foreign courts, and the fifteen millions to be paid for Louisiana. "Do you know," it was asked, "what this means? Do you know that, if the fifteen millions were divided among the States on the ratio of representation, the amount allotted to each Congressman would be $105,000; that Massachusetts would pay more than $4 a head for each man, woman, and child within her borders; that New Hampshire's share of the interest would be $87 a day; that Connecticut would be taxed $30 for every family? Thus have the professed idolizers of economy embarrassed the country with a debt of which the interest is greater than the direct tax of which they complained so bitterly. Is this a subject for a thanksgiving or a fast?"

Schouler's History, pages 65 and 66, Volume V:

This Lexington speech gave, as the orator (Clay) meant it should, the keynote of Whig opposition for the new Congress about to assemble. Its theme was the unnatural war with Mexico and its text the prophecy of Clay's Raleigh letter of 1844, already fulfilled, that in the case of Texas "annexation and war were identical."

NEWSPAPERS ON LOUISIANA PURCHASE.

[Boston Gazette, September 1, 1803.]

Fifteen millions two hundred and fifty thousand dollars is a number that may be uttered with the tongue in a single moment without any effort; it may also be described on paper in characters or figures with a few strokes of the pen; yet not one, perhaps, among a thousand comprehends or has any idea of its magnitude. * * * And for whose benefit principally are those millions of dollars to be expended?

Principally for the benefit of the Southern and Western people. Will they pay their proportion of the debt? They will not. The excise on their whisky is taken off, and what they pay in support of the Government and toward the discharge of the public debts is comparatively nothing. The burden of discharging the annual interest on this public debt will fall upon the Atlantic States, and mostly upon the Eastern and Middle States, which can receive comparatively little advantage from the acquisition of a vast and distant American wilderness.

Toasts given at a dinner given to John Quincy Adams, referring to Louisiana treaty:

"A pillow which
Intoxicates, but not composes; fills
The visionary mind with gay chimeras—
All the vile trash of sleep without the rest."

And

"May the people of the United States not acquire so much territory on earth as to lose all title to a portion of heaven."

[Boston Gazette, November 24, 1803.]

And like Anacharsis, our titled patriots, from Mr. Jefferson downwards, seem to entertain the same furious enmity against the language and common sense which they do against the religion and government of our country.

[Boston Gazette, December 1, 1803.]

Referring to the President's account of Louisiana, in which he mentions a mountain of salt:

"Some of the Democrats carry their complaisance to Mr. Jefferson to such lengths as seriously to pretend that they believe in the existence of a vast mountain of solid rock salt, 180 miles in length and 45 in width. Really, this gentleman is peculiarly unfortunate in the character of his adherents. Who can doubt the sincerity or the zeal of those who, rather than admit their friend and leader to be a fool or a madman, are willing to assume both characters to themselves. * * *

"It has been suggested that the sugar refiners in the United States are about to petition Congress to suffer no settlements nor purchases to be made in the interior of Louisiana, and to prevent all persons hereafter from exploring the enchanted country, as it is rumored that the President's private secretary, Mr. Lewis, has lately discovered an immense mountain of solid refined sugar from which a sufficient quantity may be taken to supply the whole world without occasioning any sensible diminution. In our opinion, however, the evidence of such a mountain may be questioned."

And referring to the same subject, the same paper on December 5, 1899, printed the following:

"Herostatus of old, to eternize his name,
Set the Temple of Diana all in a flame.
But Jefferson lately of Buonaparte bought,
To pickle his fame, a mountain of salt."

[New York Herald, October 26, 1803.]

The good people of New England must know that were every citizen of Virginia to vouch for Mr. Jefferson's morality (and there is a large and respectable portion who never will), the evidence could have no weight here, where morality is taken from a very different scale. Habit in that depraved State justifies what here would damn a reputation to universal contempt.

[New York Herald, May 2, 1804.]

The time will come when a foreign enemy will menace this country. Perhaps the day is not far off, for the people are rich enough and the Government pusillanimous enough to invite an invader. How shall we then be protected? By the Southern States? Take away those whites who must remain to watch over the slaves, and how many will there be to act against the enemy? Officers enough? Yes; the South is the seat of our privileged orders. But soldiers? As before, in the yeomanry of the Northern States. Who fought the battles for independence?

Who freed Virginia and the colonies from the British troops? It was the men of the North, the now destined vassals of the South. But I will not despair. The purchase of Louisiana, at the expense of $15,000,000, for the augmentation of the Southern interest must finally convince the States north of the Chesapeake that they must unite in common Northern interest. The mock Administration of Mr. Jefferson and his friends of the South will then crumble away faster than the moldering monuments of the capital. Let, therefore, the disinterested among our Federal and Democratic Republicans lay aside their fatal dissensions, which have served no purpose but the purpose of their enemies. We shall then be able to fix a just balance of power in the United States and no longer realize the fable of the serpent whose head is directed by its tail.

New York Herald, September 3, 1803, quotes Griswold's remarks in the House of Representatives October 25, 1803:

"The Government of the United States was not formed for the purpose of distributing its principles and advantages to foreign nations. It was formed with the sole view of securing those blessings to ourselves and our posterity. It follows from these principles that no power can reside in any public functionary to contract any engagement or to pursue any measure which shall change the Union of the States."

[New York Herald, January 4, 1803.]

A gentleman who was present in the House of Representatives at the debate on the treaty yesterday informed the editor that he had heard both Mr. Gallatin, the Secretary of the Treasury, and Mr. Lincoln, the Attorney-General, say that without question the third article of the treaty, incorporating Louisiana into the Union, was not warranted by the Constitution; but they thought the Constitution might be so amended as to cure this objection.

A pretty doctrine, truly! First, to make a contract with a foreign power which they had no authority to make, pay over fifteen millions of the people's money in part execution of it, and lastly set themselves to work to try if they can prevail upon the people to close the bargain. This method of doing business has at least the merit of novelty to recommend it.

In referring to the sentence in Monsieur Laussat's address to the people of Louisiana, reading as follows: "The public interest and affairs [of the United States] will now be your interest and your own business, upon which your wise and impartial opinions will be sure at length of obtaining a preponderating influence," the New York Herald says:

"Is there, we ask, is there in the United States one man with a single drop of American blood in his veins whose pride is not aroused, whose prudence is not alarmed, whose indignation is not fired, at this triumphant display of French arrogance within our own territory, and, we may almost say, within the walls of our own Congress? If there is one, he deserves not the honor of being called an American, and the sooner he expatriates himself the better."

[New York Herald, January 21, 1804.]

From the official papers received by this morning's Mississippi Herald, it appears that Louisiana has at length been quietly surrendered to our Government, so that we now have only to pay the fifteen millions, incorporate the territory in the face of the Constitution, and prepare to lose one-half of the United States, as nothing is more certain than that we pay our millions for the eventual loss of territory instead of any valuable acquisition.

But we shall more distinctly see how this looks when we come to take a view of the whole ground, as we shortly intend to do if life is spared, notwithstanding the threat of one of the friends of liberty and equality who lately said at his own table, that our attempts to place the purchase of Louisiana in a dissatisfactory point of view before the community deserved tar and feathers—and this man, this liberal advocate of free inquiry, is one of the representatives of this city. ' But it will not do, Doctor, it will not do.

We can not dismiss this article without taking notice of the sublime pomposity and rapturous nonsense of this General Wilkinson. He has officially announced that every man in his army who does not receive every Frenchman and Spaniard in Louisiana as his brother shall be expelled from the corps and marked with infamy as a wretch. This beats the farcical love-making of the French orators upon Bonaparte all hollow, or even the fraternal squeeze given to the fat West India negro wench by the president of the national convention, amidst a thousand applauses.

[New York Herald, March 7, 1804.]

Whoever will take the trouble to peruse the sketch of Congress debates will see that the friends to the equal rights of man are not a little hampered with the difficulties presented by the President's bill. The President proposes to erect a government about as despotic as that of Turkey in Asia. His friends have all the disposition in the world to gratify him, but they are afraid of consequences. And, in truth, may they well be afraid, unless they can contrive to silence all the presses of the Union.

[New York Herald, March 21, 1804.]

The folly which supposes that the people of Louisiana are not as well qualified to enjoy political liberty as those hordes of aliens and strangers who are continually intermeddling with our public concerns, will not always pass current with the people of America. Nor is it possible that any part of our empire can be long held in a state of vassalage under even the philosophic Jefferson.

We revolted from Great Britain because her Parliament taxed us without our consent, expressed by representatives. Our colonies may adopt our principles. Even the limited monarchy proposed in the bill now under discussion in the House of Representatives will not probably be established, and it is next to a certainty that the session will terminate, leaving Mr. Jefferson in complete possession of all the despotic powers which were lately acquired by the Spanish monarch.

You have ere this heard of our celebration of the cheap acquisition of Louisiana. At this noble carousal, in the presence of our philosophic President, the bands of music played "Ça ira," "Carmagnole," and other revolutionary tunes, to which the heads of thousands of Frenchmen danced off their shoulders in the murderous days of Marat and Robespierre. When the President retired he was toasted, and huzzas and tumultuous shouts succeeded. When the Vice-President retired he was also toasted—some of his friends began to huzza, but it died away in the indecent grumbling of the President's satellites. * * *

So much for the dear friends of the people who quaff their wine with distinction, and yet as one who felt that his autumn had come. His argument was epitomized in a series of resolutions which his Lexington hearers unanimously adopted. These resolutions set forth that the Mexican war had been brought on by deceit and unrighteousness, and yet its prosecution had now become a national concern; that Congress ought by some authentic act to declare the objects of this war, and control the President in his prosecution of it; that any such purpose as the wholesale annexation of Mexico (for such by many, excluded from the confidence of the Government, was supposed to be the plan) ought to be opposed under all circumstances, and especially the present; that considering our splendid series of victories, the United States ought to practice the virtues of moderation and magnanimity, requiring no dismemberment of the Mexican Republic, but only a just and proper fixation of the limits of Texas; and that we should disclaim all "wish or desire on our part to acquire any foreign territory whatever for the purpose of propagating slavery or of introducing slaves from the United States."

Fellow-citizens of the Union were further counseled to assemble in local meetings of their own and declare their opinions on the same subject. Following that last suggestion, public meetings were held in New York and various other cities and towns which indorsed these sentiments and, with the Whig presses, lauded Clay's speech as one which gave back to the people their own thoughts.

Clay did not insist, as Corwin had done before the Senate in his glowing speech of the late session, or as Winthrop had just expressed himself in a Faneuil Hall speech, pitched to Webster's earlier expression, that the war should be stopped where it was. Neither had he squarely placed himself upon the radical dogma of the Wilmot proviso, though the bearing of his resolution seemed certainly to be in that direction. * * *

By this time Scott's entry into the Mexican capital had been bulletined. * * * Webster on the Senate floor had already proposed that no territory should be annexed at all, his plea being that this Union was scarcely powerful enough or virtuous enough to bear the weight of the acquisition. Such wish for eternal chaos and seek as much confusion in government as exists in their heads.

The celebrations of Mr. Livingston's acquisition of Louisiana, as ordered by the Aurora, have been the shabbiest attempts ever exhibited to the laughter, scorn, and contempt of the American people. Take away the wild Irish, who talk so loudly about defending liberty and yet desert their country in its utmost need, and other European fugitives from justice and poverty, and the whole body of celebrators from Georgia to Massachusetts would not exceed 500.

The Democrats boast of being the majority of the people of the United States. Take away their 800,000 negro slaves, their Irish, Scotch, English, and French aliens and renegadoes, and then see where the majority will remain. They dare not try the experiment of excluding slaves from representation in Congress. If they were serious in wishing to amend the Constitution, let them advocate this amendment, or give their slaves their freedom.

If the disturbance and vexation arising from a French gang of outlaws on our western borders shall appear to be an evil worth fifteen millions to be rid of, the question arises, Have we removed or greatly mitigated the supposed evil? Had France proceeded to settle a colony there, we might calculate on some strength in her garrisons—none in her settlements. The colonists would roam the woods and their number and licentiousness might call for some American force on the Mississippi to prevent their predatory incursions on this side of the river. A small force would keep them in check.

The real danger, however, was of a different kind—their power to raise a French faction beyond the mountains. This, and not their military force, was dreaded—and this our rulers justly dreaded, because these Frenchmen profess their own principles and thus would fight them with their own weapons. Grant, however, that this population of outlaws would be a great evil, are we to expect in the present state of Louisiana to escape it?

Is Louisiana to be sold out in lots as may best suit purchasers? Who, then, will people it but those who want refuge from poverty or the laws? Say it is not to be sold at all, but kept as a park for Indians to hunt game in. How are squatters to be hindered from establishing themselves in its boundless hiding places? It will certainly require twice as much force to hinder its settlement and to preserve the property of the lands for which we lavished our millions as to defend the frontier against a languishing and, on every war, neglected French colony. Is not this a way to make new evils and aggravate old ones? Have we not shown that we lack wisdom fully as much—and that is saying a great deal—as we lack spirit?

If France should conquer England she will rule the known world, and Louisiana will be her own if she, or Spain, on her instigation, should then ask for it again. This is the bloody arena that we are to look on, says the message, with neutral eyes. * * * It would take France, in a state of prosperous industry, which she can not have, and of peace, which she will not have, one hundred and fifty years to raise the colony of Louisiana to a level in point of military force or active resources with the State of Connecticut. During the greater part of that long period the colonists will roam the wilderness, almost as destitute as the Chickasaws and Creeks, and long before that period the United States, if kept united and governed well, would possess a force that should say, and say with terror and effect to France at home, Thus far shalt thou go and no farther.

[Columbian Centinel, November 23, 1803.]

After the imagination has recovered from its intoxication, it will be time to reflect and to confess that this vast region is still wild land, of which we have had before the treaty within our old limits ten times as much as we knew what to do with. The white people of Louisiana, exclusive of the island of New Orleans and a few trading villages on the west bank of the river, are not probably 10,000. In point of productions, therefore, we have gained little by our new independent outlet. To protect the country and to collect the revenue will for many years cost ten times as much as the revenue. As to the productions of the western country within our ancient limits, be it known to the world that it did not depend on France or Spain to hinder their outlet.

When we read the treaty we find that it involves our honor; it involves also our most essential interests. It takes out of the country almost a score of millions, enough to fit and equip such a fleet as would have rendered this treaty unnecessary. It changes the identity of our nation. The United States are no longer the same. We are soon to look for our rulers and red, yellow, and black brethren beyond the Mississippi.

[Columbian Centinel, October 19, 1803.]

The Jacobin party has ever had a set of rallying words to keep its privates in their ranks. A word was ever enough, and a sentiment of any sort was generally too much. The great Virginia leaders in particular affected a sedate and principled dislike of funded debt as a source of a corruption and court influence, and therefore, to hasten the payment of our whole debt, as their strange act of Congress is titled, they repeal taxes to the amount of a million a year and run in debt for Mississippi moonshine fifteen millions more. This is done, after all that has been said, in a republic. The British monarchy is straining its utmost energies to tax almost all that is wanted within the year, to prevent the growth of their public debt. Go and do likewise, Mr. Jefferson; when you make fifteen millions debt, make taxes to meet it and pay it off.

[Columbian Centinel, August 24, 1803.]

Fifteen millions, we are told, and probably enough, twenty or twenty-five, are to be taken from the mouth of labor. For what? Wild land. For whom? For the ambitious French, the aspiring, insolent oppressors of half mankind. Our money goes to fight whose battles? Our own? Bring this point, base, cowardly, stupid readers of the "Aurora," to the test. Suppose in this strife France prevails, what are we to expect? Justice? Fools, and fools without an excuse. * * * Suppose France is victorious, the alternative is plain. We must be her slaves or her antagonists. Our fifteen millions, then, are to fight the battle against ourselves.

The Turks have, perhaps, fifty millions of people, but they are not fencibles, not military, or capable of bearing arms. They are so many tribute-paying kickables. How weak is Turkey; the weaker for the number of poor devils. America, take warning, and before you take the cold bath of the mud puddle of dishonor, ponder well whether you would be of choice another Turkey. Some men can endure shame, but who would choose it? It is not the number, it is the spirit and character of a nation that makes it great or despicable.

We pay, for the purchase of Louisiana, upward of $15,000,000—that is, $3 for every man, woman, and child in the United States. And why should our rulers be grinding the face of the poor in purchasing land which they, nor their children, nor their children's children, to the latest generation, will ever, in all probability, see cultivated. We pay for the purchase $15,000,000, which is more than all the gold and silver coined in the United States, in bank or out of bank, put together, and it is reasonable to suppose that the greater part of our specie will go to France in payment.

[Columbian Centinel, July 16, 1803.]

The puny hands of our theorists could not sustain so vast a machine as the government of the whole empire, supposing it should all be open to colonization and settlement. And if they should adopt the more rational policy of keeping it an untrodden waste for owls to hoot and wolves to howl in, the realm of alligators and catamounts, they have not the vigor and they dare not use the means to prevent the "squatting" of hosts of renegades and outlaws and fugitives who would laugh at our laws, and when they became numerous would defy our force and proclaim independence.

In that event there would be a line of division to be run, and what security is there that, by grasping at an empire of moonshine, we should not in half a century lose half our present territory? Then, fellow-citizens, buckle on your arms and prepare your forts on the not distant frontier, to keep off the enemies whom fear and rivalship and neighborhood will make implacable.

Then our lamblike tobacco planters will find their dread of standing armies subdued by their greater dread of predatory incursions from the mountains. Then, perhaps, indeed we may cling to our Government and be inspired, if we should be capable of the inspiration of patriotism, by the shame and apprehension of a foreign yoke. The perils of our situation might engender the virtues that it would need, the only virtues that could surmount those perils, the seeds of which were sown in 1798, but which have since watered on the stalk.

CONSTITUTION.

"We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution of the United states," and remarked, "It is we, the people of the United States, for ourselves and our posterity," not for the people of Louisiana, nor for the people of New Orleans, or of Canada.

None of these enters into the scope of the instrument. It embraces only the United States of America. Who those are it may seem strange in this place to inquire. But truly our imaginations have of late been so accustomed to wander after new settlements to the very end of the earth that it will not be time ill spent to inquire what this phrase means and what it includes. These are not terms adopted at hazard; they have reference to a state of things existing anterior to the Constitution. * * *

Do you suppose the people of the Northern and Atlantic States will, or ought to, look on with patience and see Representatives and Senators from the Red River and Missouri pouring themselves upon this and the other floor, managing the concerns of a seaboard 1,500 miles at least from their residence, and having a preponderancy in councils into which, constitutionally, they could never have been admitted? I have no hesitation upon this point. They neither will see it, nor ought they to see it, with content. * * * This great usurpation which creeps into this House under the plausible appearance of giving content to that important point, New Orleans, starts up a gigantic power to control the nation. * * * The bill, if it passes, is a deathblow to the Constitution.

"Mr. Gold sided with Josiah Quincy in the main points of his arguments, and even justified the language which that distinguished member of the House had used when recommending a dissolution of the Union should the bill pass."

On January 14, 1811, Josiah Quincy, speaking in opposition to the bill for the admission of Louisiana, said:

"I address you, Mr. Speaker, with an anxiety and distress of mind with me wholly unprecedented. The friends of this bill seem to consider it as the exercise of a common power, as an ordinary affair, a mere municipal regulation, which they expect to see pass without other questions than those concerning details. But, sir, the principle of this bill materially affects the liberties and rights of the whole people of the United States. To me it appears that it would justify a revolution in this country, and that in no great length of time it may produce it."

"When I see the zeal and perseverance with which this bill has been urged along its preliminary path; when I know the local interests and associated projects which combine to promote its success, all opposition to it seems painfully unavailing. I am almost tempted to leave without a struggle my country to its fate. But while there is life there is hope. So long as the fatal shaft has not yet been sped, if heaven so wills it, the bow may be broken and the vigor of the mischief-meditating arm withered. * * *

"Under the sanction of this rule of conduct I am compelled to declare it as my deliberate opinion that if this bill passes the bonds of the Union are virtually dissolved, that the States which compose it are free from their moral obligations, and that as it will be the right of all, so it will be the duty of some, definitely to prepare for a separation, amicably if they can, violently if they must."

President Lamar, of Texas, in his inaugural address, December 9, 1838, said, speaking of the current agitation of annexation:

"I have never myself been able to perceive the policy of the desired connection or discover in it any advantage, either civil, political, or commercial, which could possibly result to Texas. But, on the contrary, a long train of consequences of the most appalling character and magnitude have never failed to present themselves whenever I have entertained the subject, and force upon my mind the unwelcome conviction that the step, once taken, would produce a lasting regret, and ultimately prove as disastrous to our liberty and hopes as the triumphant sword of the enemy."

Mr. Winthrop, in the House of Representatives, January 6, 1845, said, in regard to the annexation of Texas:

"As he has said on a previous occasion, that the whole scheme was unconstitutional in substance and in form; that it was contrary to the law of nations, and was a violation of the good faith of our own country, and in his judgment it was eminently calculated to involve this country into an unjust and dishonorable war. * * *

"Now, he was no despiser of precedents, especially such precedents as were furnished by the early Cabinets, for which he had the most deferential respect; but he could not understand this disregard of all precedents in all other cases than this annexation of Texas and such a precedent as the cession of Louisiana afforded. Why, they knew that Mr. Jefferson in his letter to Mr. Breckinridge acknowledged that they were doing an act which went beyond the Constitution.

"He read an extract from a letter witten by Mr. Jefferson, in which he expressed the opinion that the limits of the United States were fixed, and that the Constitution of the United States was made for the territory so limited; and that he could not believe that the intention was to permit Congress to admit new States which should be formed out of new territory not included in those limits. Mr. Jefferson did not believe that Congress had such power; and who did believe it? There were compromises in the Constitution; and he would here take occasion to say that Massachusetts had been falsely charged with a design to violate these compromises because she had thought fit to submit a proposition to amend the Constitution."

Mr. Douglas said he agreed with the gentleman from Massachusetts, that if we annexed Texas to the Union it must be done consistently with the Constitution, and he was satisfied that Congress had the constitutional power to do it. In regard to the power to annex foreign territory to the Union, he had only to call the attention of the gentlemen to the fact that in the articles of the old Confederation there was a proviso that Canada might be admitted to the Union as a matter of right whenever she asked it, and that any other colony might be admitted with the consent of the nine States. * * *

It was certainly the intention of the framers of the Confederacy to admit foreign States into the Union if they could get nine States to vote for it. * * * They struck out the proviso requiring assent of nine States for the admission of new States and inserted a proviso that Congress might do it * * * by the votes of a majority.—Abridgment of the Debates of Congress.

[Schouler's History, Volume IV, page 458.]

When Secretary Upshur had directly charged such a plot (this British plot, as it was called, was to persuade Texas to abolish its own slavery), Lord Aberdeen denied it; he admitted, however, that Great Britain desired to further the cause of emancipation throughout the world. This admission Calhoun presently made the text of long homilies for home effect in defense of slave institutions. It was quite in the line of Upshur's correspondence, but it disconcerted the President; for it put Texas annexation before the country, not as a plan for national benefit, but as a Southern and special one, in the interest of slave breeding.

Before Calhoun took his seat in the Cabinet, and even before the fatal explosion on board the Princeton which made a vacancy for him, this clandestine negotiation, which led the country up to the cannon's mouth without a word of warning or consultation and in utter disregard of the rights of nations, began to get wind outside. The Washington correspondent of a New York press late in February was the first to mention the rumor, which the public could scarcely believe. A few weeks earlier an open letter from Webster reiterated the ex-Secretary's views on the impolicy of annexation; and under the same inspiration, so it appears, Winthrop introduced resolutions of the same tenor in the House, while the Washington Intelligencer sounded the alarm in some vigorous editorials.

The news that a treaty which joined Texas to the United States was ready for the final signatures startled the country like a cannonade. There was a panic in New York Exchange, as though war with Mexico had been declared already. The Madisonian, Tyler's official organ, would neither confirm or deny the exciting report, but in the Richmond Enquirer was printed a letter from Andrew Jackson, which he wrote nearly a year before in favor of Texas annexation; and that newspaper, with the Globe, took up a warm espousal of the cause on general principles.

As a checkmate, the Massachusetts legislature set the example of resolutions which protested violently that the Constitution gave no permission to join a foreign state to the American Union. * * * A new issue was sprung upon our politics on the very eve of the Presidential battle, an issue strong enough to rend asunder the whole plan of campaign. John Tyler had played his last stake with utter want of principle, but with an address and intrepidity which forced those who had disparaged his talents to think better of them.

In the Eighth Congress Mr. Pickering spoke as follows on the Louisiana treaty (Annals of Congress):

"Mr. P. never doubted the right of the United States to acquire new territory, either by purchase or by conquest, and to govern the territory so acquired as a dependent province, and in this way might Louisiana have become a Territory of the United States and have received a form of government infinitely preferable to that to which its inhabitants are now subject. * * * Mr. P. said that whatever way he turned his eyes war was in prospect, as the final result of our pacific measures, measures deemed so wise as to have been ascribed to divine inspiration. He wished they might merit that high character, but feared in the end they would bear the stamp of indiscretion, perhaps of folly."

The divisions which have been formed out of the territory acquired by the Louisiana purchase are as follows: Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, Iowa, Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, Indian Territory, a portion of Oklahoma, a portion of Colorado, most of Wyoming, most of Montana.

Mr. LITTLE. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KLUTTZ].

Mr. KLUTTZ. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday, when the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill, my distinguished friend from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY] evidently thought that the House had resolved itself into a court of appeals for the consideration of the North Carolina election law, or at least into a forum for the manufacture of campaign speeches for home consumption.

In replying briefly to his diatribe against the people of the South in general and the good people of North Carolina in particular, I shall add no word of sectional or personal bitterness to this discussion. Would God, sir, that we could let the dead past bury its dead and that we could leave the great questions settled by our great war where they were settled by the dread arbitrament of arms thirty-five years ago.

In a conversation, about the close of the Spanish-Cuban war, which I had with the honored Chief Magistrate of this great Republic, a man who, while I differ from his most cherished policies, I yet honor as an able, a patriotic, and an honest American, he said to me, sir, that that war was worth all it had cost if it had done no more than to obliterate sectionalism and to bring all the people of all the sections of this great country into a common understanding with each other once more. It was a noble sentiment, sir, nobly expressed, worthy the chief citizen of this great Republic, and it was a sentiment to which I most ardently responded; a sentiment to which I believe the thinking people of this country, without regard to politics or to sections, most heartily subscribe.

And yet, sir, when, as the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY] said, a foreign soil is drinking up the blood of American heroes, Northern born, Eastern born, Western born, and Southern born, alike; when Fitz Lee and Joe Wheeler fighting along with Lawton and Shafter and Otis and MacArthur, have demonstrated that the Southern people are loyal to the flag of our fathers, and that when it is unfurled they are willing to go as far as the farthest in defense of American rights and of American liberties [applause]; when Worth Bagley, of North Carolina, laid down his life and crimsoned the deck of his ship with his warm life-blood, poured out as a precious libation upon the altar of his country's rights and of his country's needs; when Hobson has rivaled Thermopylæ; and when, as volunteers have been called for, the battalions have come trooping from the savannas, the plains, and the mountains of the South, and side by side have fought with your boys from the East and the North and the West in upholding the honor and the glory of that flag, which, I thank God, waves once more over a reunited country [applause]—when these occurrences have taken and are taking place, I hear a note of discord, and it comes, I am sorry to say, from two North Carolina Republicans—in hoarse, bass notes from the Senate wing of the Capitol, and in the high treble of the mountain region of North Carolina in this House—a discordant note, endeavoring to rekindle the fires of sectionalism, which, thank God, had almost expired, and to reopen questions which ought to remain settled.

Why, Mr. Chairman, is this so? There is some reason for it. I do not know whether it is because these gentlemen see the handwriting on the wall; I do not know whether it is because in the reawakened condition of things in the South they feel that they and others like them are no longer to be permitted to misrepresent the good people who sent them here; but there is certainly some reason for it.

My friend seems to be fond of reading from newspapers. I have a clipping here from a newspaper published in this city which, I believe, is in close sympathy with the Administration, the Washington Star. That paper says:

About this time look out for internal activity in Republican circles in those Southern States where there is not the ghost of a chance for Republican success at the polls. The long four years' sleep is about at an end. So called leaders who have not been on the ground half a dozen times since 1896 will come trooping back from their places of residence elsewhere. Resident leaders who are holding Federal offices will rub their eyes and begin to look around. Conferences will be held. State conventions will be called. Tickets will be put in the field. And, particularly, delegates to the next Republican national convention will be chosen. Why is the forum crowded? What means this stir in Rome?

In the lower Southern States this activity is but a prelude to a scramble for Federal office. It can accomplish nothing in the way of electing any local ticket put up. The Republican party there is but a name; and not a name to conjure with. It contains some able and excellent men, but they have not demonstrated the qualities of political leadership. Between Presidential elections nothing is done. The opposition is left in undisputed possession of the field, and fills every local office from governor to constable. But when Presidential year dawns, the great drums are beaten, the horns are sounded, the standards are unfurled, and a most solemn dress parade is enacted. There is a marching up the hill and a marching down the hill, but nothing else takes place.

It may be for the reasons suggested in this article that this discordant note is struck at this time. I ask my colleagues on this floor from other sections of the country to believe that the people of North Carolina, as shown by her history in the past, are as honest, as patriotic, as God-fearing, as law abiding as the people of any other section of this great country, whatever her ungrateful sons may say of her on this floor. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman has devoted his attention to the election law of North Carolina. With a Republican supreme court in his own State, I challenge him, if he believes this law to be unconstitutional, if he desires to put it to the test, to bring it, not into this jurisdictionless forum, for political purposes, but to take it before his own Republican supreme court in his own State and let that court say whether or not it is constitutional.

The gentleman dwelt upon the word "discreet" used in that statute, and he gave a definition of the word "discreet," which he intended to be witty. Now, let me read what Webster says of the word "discreet."

Discreet: Possessed of discernment, especially in avoiding error or evil, and in the adaptation of means to ends; prudent; sagacious; circumspect, not rash, headlong, or heedless; cautious, wary.

So that if a lawyer, choosing language which was intended to exactly express his meaning, were to search through all the dictionaries for a word which in its meaning would crystallize and most aptly express the qualifications which ought to be required of every election officer, he could not choose a better word than "discreet." And yet, forsooth, because this law absolutely requires the selection of persons possessing such characteristics as officers and managers of election, the gentleman in his desperation undertakes to hold it up to the scorn and derision of this House.

To such sophistry is he reduced in this appeal to the prejudices of the majority.

Equally disingenuous is his attempted characterization of section 11 of this act. The gentleman goes into affected jeremiads over the terrible proposition that the "registrar may require the applicant to prove his identity or age and residence by the testimony of at least two electors under oath." To the heated imagination of the gentleman this is a horrible requirement, while in the judgment of fair-minded men of all parties who are cognizant of the cases which it is intended to meet, it is not only a wise and salutary provision, but one which is absolutely necessary to protect the purity of the ballot. With a migratory colored population, each of whom more or less nearly resembles the other, rendering identification almost impossible, fraudulent registration of minors, convicts, nonresidents, nonnaturalized foreigners, etc., is preventable only by requiring satisfactory identification and proof of age, and this is all that this provision does.

The gentleman's labored argument that "gray hairs and wrinkles, the sure evidences of age," are not to be and will not be taken into consideration by the registrars is to assume and to assert that every registrar will deliberately discredit the evidence of his own senses and perjure himself for party advantage—a charge so unwarranted, so sweeping in its denunciation of a large and respectable body of his fellow-citizens, that I am astonished that the gentleman should make it.

The gentleman complains that all the registrars will be Democrats. True, there will be but one registrar for each precinct, and where capable Democrats can be found he will doubtless in most cases be of that faith; but how is this worse than the election law of the gentleman's own party, that of 1895, which he so extravagantly lauds, as well as that of 1897, under which there were three registrars, one of whom was required to be a Democrat, one a Populist, and one a Republican, giving to the corrupt and unnatural fusion between the Republicans and Populists, two registrars at every precinct to one Democrat, thus putting the election machinery absolutely under the control of the fusionists as effectually as if the Democrats had had no representation at all. That was all right in the eyes of my distinguished friend, but it makes a wonderful difference with him whose ox is gored.

But, further, not only did this extend to the registrars, but the three judges of election for each precinct were similarly appointed, so that the Democratic party was absolutely powerless throughout every stage of the registration and election.

How is it now?

Under this reviled and much denounced Democratic election law there are two judges for each precinct, who must be of different political parties, and yet the gentleman yearns for the good old times of two against one.

Thus, Mr. Chairman, I have briefly attempted to expose the fallacies and sophistries of the gentleman's attack. He does indeed cite with great satisfaction to himself a North Carolina case, that of Van Bokkelen et al. vs. Cannady (73 N. C. Reports), to sustain his contention that the present election law is unconstitutional. The most superficial examination of that case will show that it is not only not decisive of this contention, but that it has little if any application to the law in hand.

The case was decided in 1875 upon facts arising in 1873, two years before the adoption of important amendments to the constitution of North Carolina changing the time of residence in counties and towns required for registration. Thirty days was then the constitutional requirement, and the court decided that it could not be extended to ninety, while ninety days is now the requirement of both the constitution and of this election law. The other questions decided have no pertinence whatever, and yet the gentleman introduces this case to prove the unconstitutionality of this law. Learned lawyer as he is, with the great law libraries of the nation at his command, how hard pressed he is for authority! The only remaining count in his arraignment is that the voter has no appeal from the registrar. Truly this is pitiable.

As a matter of fact, no such appeal has ever been practicable under any election law ever passed in North Carolina, so far as I have been able to discover. Under the fusion election law of 1897 the judges of the supreme and superior courts were given supervision and control over the county boards as to the appointment of registrars and judges of election, with power of removal and right to hear complaints of violations of duty by such officers and to require cause to be shown, and so forth, under penalties, but nowhere do I find any provision for an appeal by the individual elector from the ruling of the registrar.

This dragging the judiciary into the mire of practical politics and requiring judges personally interested in the result of the election (our judiciary being elective) to pass upon petty disputes as to appointment of registrars and judges was one of the most distasteful and dangerous features of the bad law which the Democratic party has wiped off the statute book and replaced with one infinitely fairer and better. Time would fail me to advert to all the objectionable features, partisan features, outrageously unfair features, of that law which the gentleman so highly lauds.

Let the mention of one suffice.

Registration of voters in incorporated towns and cities was allowed until 9 o'clock p. m. of the second Saturday before the election, while the time for challenges (except where parties came of age, and so forth) expired at the earlier hour of 4 o'clock p. m. of the same day. In the border counties, where hordes of negro voters could be easily and cheaply imported, what opportunities for fraud did this not offer?

But I shall not follow the gentleman further. Why should I? His evasion of the question as to why he does not take this law to his own Republican supreme court is so palpable as to be undeserving of serious notice.

Nor shall I dignify the gentleman's very original, very unwarranted, and very unnatural way of accounting for the frequency of lynchings with any extended reply. I would do him no injustice, but if his language means anything, it means that the denial of the right to vote is the provocative cause of lynching! In reply to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURKE] he said:

> The point I make is this: The suggestion of my friend from Texas is a good one, and I thank him for it. He has not these lynchings in his State, thank God, and we have not them in ours. Why? Because in his State they have a pure ballot, as we did have in ours up to the vicious election laws of 1899.

In the light of what all the world knows as to the deplorable and detestable crime which is the great cause of lynching, not only in the South but the world over, I leave the gentleman's explanation to his constituents and to his own conscience. Judging, however, by the gentleman's own standard, this "vicious election law of 1899" has given North Carolina a "purer ballot" than she had under the fusion election law of 1895–97; for whereas in 1898 under that law there were four lynchings in the State, under the present law, which he so roundly reviles, I am informed there was not a single lynching in 1899. The gentleman's argument overreaches itself and proves entirely too much. Mr. Chairman, this unseemly controversy was not of my seeking.

I deprecate alike the reopening of sectional debate and the discussion here of matters purely internal to the several States. Let us fight out our questions of internal State policy at home and reserve our best thought and our best effort for the national weal when we come here.

Every State in this Union has its own troublesome internal questions to deal with, and each State ought to be ready and willing to concede the patriotism, the willingness, and the wisdom of every of her sisters to settle her own problems for herself without the intermeddling of outsiders.

The better thought of this great body of representatives of all the people ought to frown upon that son of any State who for selfish or partisan gain would disturb the fast-cementing ties of the reunited sections or, worse, would here decry and deride the people of his own State. Let me, by way of warning, say this to my distinguished friend from North Carolina, for we have long been personal friends: In this beautiful capital city of the nation we unveiled a few days ago a splendid statue of one of America's greatest statesmen, Daniel Webster, the great expounder of the Constitution.

In the eloquent and scholarly address delivered on that occasion by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], he placed Mr. Webster's claims to enduring greatness not upon his attainments as a lawyer, not upon his fame as a politician, not upon his achievements as a statesman, though in all these he was truly great, but rather upon his matchless eloquence and ability as an orator.

With this estimate, sir, I fully agree, and I recollect that of all the great speeches of that great orator there is none at all comparable to his mighty reply to the rapier thrusts of that great South Carolinian, Hayne.

And, sir, of that great oration, it is not his great expositions of the Constitution, not his grand apostrophes to the Union, which form its chiefest charm and dwell more lovingly in the hearts of men, but rather his matchless defense of Massachusetts, his mighty apostrophe to her people and her history. These have made his name immortal; but I have yet to learn that any man has commended himself to the intelligence and patriotism of Congress or the country, much less to fame, by besmirching and impugning his own people. This way lies not true greatness.

Mr. Chairman, I must have done. North Carolina needs neither apology nor eulogy at my hands. Every glowing fact in her glorious history and development—colonial, Revolutionary, antebellum and post-bellum—proclaims the greatness, the heroism, the patriotism, the truthfulness, and the trustfulness of her people. With them duty is paramount, obligation is sacred, law is supreme. In their own best way, tired of corrupt and ruinous fusion legislation, they are dealing with the great racial, financial, educational, and political problems which confront them. With faith in themselves, in God, and in humanity; with a full appreciation of their duty to themselves, to their country, to the Constitution, to their homes and loved ones, they will, in God's good time, undeterred by threats of force bills or Federal interference, work out these problems to the glory of God and the good of mankind. [Applause.]

Mr. LITTLE. I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GRIGGS].

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to make any remarks during this debate, but the remarkable performance of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY] seems to demand notice from some one of the Southern members against whose States wholesale charges of disorder, mobocracy, and lynchings have been made so recklessly.

I shall not attempt anything now except to reply to some aspersions of that gentleman against the State of Georgia, which I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor. His speech, "pregnant with little learning and much ignorance," affords a spectacle to the people of the United States that must be humiliating to the good people of the State which sends him here. I have no personal quarrel with him for his opinion. He has a right to his opinions, and I have no right to quarrel with him for those opinions. I can see no occasion for the intrusion of this question here but for political effect. If so, Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman knows so well the cause of the great majority of lynchings in the South, it is wholly unjustifiable and utterly without excuse.

I am reminded by it of an occurrence between old Col. Sam Tate, of Tennessee, and Col. Jim Robertson, of Georgia, on the one side, in the old times of railroad building in the South, and a railroad president with whom they were having a controversy in Chattanooga. After spending the entire day in discussion, the matter being finally concluded and the railroad man gone, Robertson turned to Colonel Tate and said, "Colonel, I think he is honest, don't you?" "Yes," said Colonel Tate, "I reckon he is honest, Robertson, but he has the all-firedest notions of honesty of any man I ever saw." [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina may be a good man in his way, but he has the most remarkable ideas of political decency of any gentleman whom I ever had the pleasure of knowing.

So far as Georgia is concerned, Mr. Chairman, we have no repressive or suppressive laws regarding the ballot. We do not need them. There is manhood suffrage in Georgia. Every man, black or white, rich or poor, educated or illiterate, is entitled to vote, provided he pays $1 poll tax in the year before he offers to vote. So far as the law is concerned, therefore, Georgia stands clear. We do not have the law complained of by the gentleman; we do not need such law; and the Georgia legislature, by an almost unanimous vote, not over six weeks ago, declined to pass any law of that character.

I have no criticism upon those States which need them and have enacted them. They know their necessities and they have the right under the Constitution which our fathers gave us to enact legislation in consonance with that great instrument to protect the civilization of their States. I have not read the North Carolina statute complained of, but I presume it must be a good law, as I am informed that under its provisions the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LINNEY] will probably be left at home at the next election, when he will be free to enjoy the sweets of circuit court riding among his native hills. [Applause.] He is more to be pitied than blamed.

I can see no reason for intruding this question but, as charged by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KLUTTZ], political necessity. The gentleman says he was once a Democrat, and he talks as if he knows much of the alleged devious ways of that great party in North Carolina. Before he makes too many disclosures I want to commend to him, Mr. Chairman, a story I have heard, which was said to have occurred between a preacher and a lawyer once in Georgia. It is said that this drunken lawyer one Sunday morning walked into church during the services, and as he was staggering up the aisle the minister stopped his discourse and said to him in sepulchral tones, "Sir, I will testify against you in the day of judgment." The lawyer replied, "That's all right, old man; I have been practicing law twenty years, and it has been my experience at all times that the damnedest rascal was always first to turn state's evidence." [Laughter and applause.] I hope the gentleman does not intend to turn state's evidence, Mr. Chairman.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I said, he is not to be blamed so much as pitied. He was once a Democrat and is now a Republican.

> God, Thou know'st
> Howe'er they smile and feign and boast,
> What happiness is theirs who fall.

Having seen better days, he loves to talk of them and perhaps enjoys his performances in that connection.

Now, Mr. Chairman, with reference to lynchings in Georgia, I shall not deny that we are cursed with occasional lynchings. I do not believe there is a State in the Union in which Judge Lynch has not at some time presided. But let me tell you of a case that happened in Georgia last year. A little family a few miles from the town of Newnan were at supper in their modest dining room. The father, the young mother, and the baby were seated at the table. Humble though it was, peace, happiness, and contentment reigned in that modest home. A monster in human form, an employee on the farm, crept into that happy little home and with an ax knocked out the brains of that father, snatched the child from its mother, threw it across the room out of his way, and then by force accomplished his foul purpose.

More than that, Mr. Chairman, he was afflicted with the most loathsome disease known to human kind. In that room—the husband and father dead and weltering in his own blood, the infant senseless on the floor—he spent four hours alone with that poor woman. When, more dead than alive, she at last escaped and gave the alarm, the people were frenzied with passion, and when they captured him they lynched him. They burned him at the stake.

I do not seek to justify that, but I do say that the man who would condemn those people unqualifiedly under these circumstances has water instead of blood to supply his circulation. [Applause.] Not the limpid water that flows from the mountain streams, Mr. Chairman, but the fetid water found in the cesspools of the cities. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, can you blame those people for that? I appeal to you, gentlemen—you fathers, you husbands; to all men, white or black, North or South, East or West—do you blame those people for that burst of human fury? God forbid that there should be any man on this continent who would! Thank God, there is not a man in Georgia who does. Bring it home to yourselves, gentlemen, and answer me in the light of truth.

Mr. Chairman, those men were standing for civilization—Anglo-Saxon civilization. They were fighting for the purity and the virtue and the safety of the Southern home. We propose to protect the women of the South. We propose to fight for and to maintain the supremacy of the Anglo-Saxon race—that race which gentlemen have sought to justify here to-day in shooting brown men in the Philippines in the name of civilization; that race which is to-day shooting Boers in South Africa in the name of civilization. The people of Georgia, the people of all the South, propose in the name of that same great civilization to stand by their traditions, to preserve the integrity of the race and to preserve its control everywhere, under all circumstances, whenever it is threatened from any source. [Applause.]

Gentlemen who attack lynching in the South should at the same time attack the crime which most largely incites lynching. I speak only for Georgia, Mr. Chairman. Other gentlemen can and doubtless will speak for the States they represent. Fully five-sixths of the lynchings in Georgia come from this one cause. I deplore the fact, but fact it is.

But the South has no monopoly on lynchings, Mr. Chairman. I have time to call your attention to only a few in widely separated States not for purposes of recrimination, but I assert that so long as there are lynchings in Illinois, in Indiana, Ohio, and Kansas, in New York, Pennsylvania, and Colorado, the difference between the people of those States and the people of Georgia and the people of Alabama and the people of Mississippi is simply a difference in degree and not in kind.

This editorial in the Washington Star seeks to "alter the bearing of the recent lynchings" in Kansas by showing that it was done as a warning to Kansas officials to enforce the law more vigorously in future.

Here is a press dispatch from Dunbar, Pa., of December 19, last year, giving an account of the lynching of a negro for murder.

Here is an account of a Sunday celebration in Carterville, Ill., where seven poor negroes were slain in cold blood for the crime of seeking work, while the gatling-gun quarantine of the governor of that great State threatened against the importation of negro miners into the State was public talk all over the country last year. I have merely to mention Pana, Virden, and Rockford to call to your mind vivid pictures of mob violence.

Three years ago a negro was roasted in Ouray, Colo., for shooting a white girl.

Even in staid old Massachusetts, Mr. Chairman, mobs have in time past defied the law, and once her great Senator [Mr. HOAR] addressed a crowd in Worcester while not a criminal, but an officer of the law was making his escape through the back door of the court-house from the infuriated mob. It is useless to multiply words, Mr. Chairman; human passions are the same the world over.

The Anglo-Saxon of New England, while perhaps slower, is as sure as the Anglo-Saxon of the South. I doubt not that if the 600,000 negroes of Georgia were transported to Massachusetts to-morrow and the ravishment of their white women began by the lowest of this alien race there would be two or three solemn and dignified trials. After that the blood of the men who wrested Magna Charta from King John would assert itself and the oaks of Massachusetts' hills and dales would be desecrated with the bodies of the victims of "lynching bees."

I would not have you understand me as presenting here a wholesale indictment against the colored race of the Southern States. As a rule they are peaceful, happy, contented, and law-abiding. They have their churches and their schools and are progressing, I hope, toward a higher civilization. The brutes who suffer at the hands of infuriated mobs are hardly worth a thought from the better classes of either race. It remains, nevertheless, Mr. Chairman, that the people of the South have a hard problem before them.

A distinguished member of this House from a far Northern State—a partisan Republican—said to me on yesterday, "This is your problem, and you have nothing from me but sympathy." I appeal to every Anglo-Saxon within the sound of my voice, I appeal to every white man who believes in his race, wherever he may live, give to us, the people who must solve this problem, at least your sympathy while we labor for its solution with justice to the black man and safety for the white man. [Mr. GRIGGS concluded amid loud applause.]

Mr. LITTLE. I yield six minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, in the course of a most delightful presentation of his reasons for favoring the annexation of the Philippine Islands, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] stated that he proposed to prove by incontrovertible documentary evidence that when the proposition for the Louisiana purchase was under discussion all the arguments that have been used against the annexation of the Philippine Islands were then used. If that be true, it is important. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will give me his attention for five minutes, I think I will have no difficulty in pointing out some very cogent arguments against the annexation of the Philippines, which, in the very nature of the case, could not have been urged against the proposal to annex the territory embraced in the Louisiana purchase.

We contend that the Philippine Islands are as densely populated as the State of Ohio; that therefore they are not open to American occupation.

This argument could not have been urged against the Louisiana purchase.

We contend that the inhabitants of the islands are alien in blood, alien in traditions, alien in ideals; that they never can comprehend, much less apply, our system, and that therefore they can never be Americanized.

We contend that according to the programme mapped out by the President the Philippines must forever be governed, if they are taken under our protection, by a carpetbag government, the chief officers thereof to be appointed by the Executive; this carpetbag government will do business 10,000 miles away from this capital—therefore not subject to surveillance—and that experience proves that such a government is more apt to be corrupt and incompetent than honest and trustworthy, a curse to the country subjected to it and a disgrace to the United States.

We contend that when we conquered and occupied the city of Manila we did so in conjunction with an army of 18,000 Filipinos who had beleaguered that city for months and captured the north half of it before the arrival of our forces, and that under such circumstances it can not be denied that there existed at the time of the downfall of Spanish authority in the Philippines a military alliance between this country and the Filipino forces, and that we have not dealt fairly with a people who trusted us blindly and deserve fair treatment in return.

We deny that Congress has constitutional power to vest in the Executive with reference to those islands extra-constitutional powers. The President and his supporters propose to treat the Filipinos not as aliens, not as citizens, but as conquered subjects, possessing no political rights which the conqueror is bound to respect. The programme includes the enactment of protective tariff laws to keep them from marketing their goods in this country.

It follows that we may also enact laws prohibiting Filipinos from emigrating to the United States. We say that Congress possesses no power to thus deal with any part of the territory of the United States. We say that if you permanently annex the Philippine Islands their people will thenceforth be charged with every responsibility, amenable to every law, and entitled to the full enjoyment of every right, privilege, and blessing conferred by the Constitution and laws upon other citizens of this country. In my remarks yesterday I directed attention to a dozen well-considered cases in which the Supreme Court of the United States has said that acquired territory becomes, when annexed, a part of the territory of the United States—subject to the Constitution, subject to the laws applicable to the entire country. As to tariff laws, Congress has no special office to perform in dealing with acquired territory. The laws applicable to the other parts of the country must in the nature of things, under the Constitution, apply to them.

Now let the gentleman from Pennsylvania answer me. Was any one of these questions involved in the annexation of Louisiana? The gentleman comes here and fairly charms us with a speech filled with beautiful platitudes, poetical quotations, and well-rounded periods. Let me urge him to descend from empyrean regions and get down to the earth on which we are doing business. Let me urge him to direct his attention not to the starry firmament, but to the prosy earth and to the discussion of the practical concerns in which our people are interested.

We are told that the Philippines will furnish a market for our goods. I tell you that a country so impoverished, with labor earning 6 to 20 cents a day, with the commodities upon which the people live based upon that level of prices, can not be an extraordinarily profitable field of industry or commerce or trade.

We are told that we shall be especially benefited. We know that we must go to an expense of fifty, sixty, or one hundred million dollars a year in maintaining American sovereignty in the islands, but the "open door" is to be maintained, so that other nations will compete with us, on terms of equality, for the trade of that country, just as if we were not in possession. We pay the bills, and afterwards rustle for our share of the trade. We could do as well without deluging the islands in blood and wasting so many millions of treasure.

Has the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] analyzed the "open-door" policy proposed by the President? Not only are the Philippines to be governed outside of the protection of the Constitution and our laws, but they are to be so far beyond our control that henceforth, as a matter of international obligation, we must admit foreigners to these markets upon terms of equality with ourselves. And the American taxpayer must foot the bills.

What folly it is to compare the Louisiana purchase to the Philippine Islands! I voted for the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands, and I spoke in favor of it, because the islands were American, with institutions and a government American in every fiber. I would vote to-day, if I had the opportunity, to restore to the Filipinos their country, because it belongs to them as much as this country belongs to us. And I would give it to them because in a prolonged struggle against Spanish oppression her patriots have fallen by thousands while battling for independence. [Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri concluded amid applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LITTLE. I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, I intend to discuss three important matters pertaining to the administration of the law in the Hawaiian Islands, producing a condition that must be horrible to the inhabitants of that country, shocking to us, and alarming to Congress, which made them a part of the American Republic, as stated by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] a few moments ago.

The supreme court of those islands, kept in office by the consent of the President of the United States, has in recent opinions held that the Constitution of the United States does not apply in those islands as to trials by jury and the collection of tariff duties. The court holds that in felony cases a defendant may be indicted without the intervention of a grand jury and convicted by 9 out of 12 petit jurors, notwithstanding the fifth and sixth amendments of the Constitution of the United States.

In another case that a verdict is legal of nine out of twelve jurors in civil cases (the old Hawaiian law), notwithstanding the seventh amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and in the third case that the customs duties that obtained there under the Hawaiian tariff previous to the annexation of those islands are collectible, notwithstanding that this makes a tariff for Hawaii and one for the United States—two totally different—and in spite of the provisions (two) of the Constitution of the United States which ordains that—

All duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

Nor shall vessels bound to or from one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another.

The court contends that the treaty by which we annexed the Hawaiian Islands so provided.

As to the question of customs duties, this decision of the court is based very largely upon the opinions of two professors—one of Yale and one of Harvard—while the leading cases of Cross vs. Harrison (16 How., 164—1853) and of Fleming vs. Page (9 How., 603—1849) are doubted and denied.

In the Cross case I believe Justice Wayne spoke for the entire court. The court unanimously held that as soon as the treaty with Mexico was confirmed, what is now California became a part of the United States. I will read the exact words of the opinion on that point.

By the ratification of the treaty California became a part of the United States. (16 How., 196.)

In addition to that, Mr. Chairman, the Constitution itself, that these Hawaiian judges and the President were sworn to support, uphold, and enforce, ordains:

The Constitution and laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof shall be the supreme law of the land.

The Constitution shall be what? The "law." The "law" of what? The law of the "land." What "land?" The United States—the old and new States when admitted, and the old and new Territories when acquired, and the courts have so held and Congress has so legislated.

Justice Marshall in an early case, since followed and never doubted or denied, on a question of taxation in the District of Columbia thus defined the term "United States:"

Does this term designate the whole or any particular portion of the American empire? Certainly this question can admit of but one answer. It is the name given to our great Republic, which is composed of States and Territories. The District of Columbia or the territory west of the Missouri is not less within the United States than Maryland or Pennsylvania. (Loughborough vs. Blake, 5 Wheaton, 137.)

The Constitution, then, is the law of that "land" which is geographically known as the United States, the United States as such, the States as such, and the Territories of the United States. The framers of the Constitution knew that the (future) United States would have to control certain territory already ceded to the (future) United States and before the Constitution was framed, and that other cessions from other States would soon follow, and did, after the Constitution was ratified. Would they, then, have been guilty of not framing the Constitution so as to govern this territory and inhabitants or to govern them outside of the Constitution—as slaves, subjects, or dependents?

We think not, and they did not, and history and the courts show as much.

But I will later on in a general way allude to the law that clearly shows that the Constitution applies to our Territories as well as to the States. In the Cross-Harrison case, which not only upheld the Constitution as to customs duties, but also the Administration of President Polk, the court said:

The right claimed to land foreign goods within [what is now California] the United States at any place out of a collection district, if allowed, would be a violation of that provision of the Constitution which enjoins that all duties, imports, excises, shall be uniform thoughout the United States.

Justice Marshall, in the fifth Wheaton case already alluded to, so held the law as to the District of Columbia, and every other authority, I dare say; but this insular court that has passed upon this question has so held and declared the law, and that whenever we acquire any territory anywhere the people of that territory are entitled to every fundamental right and protection that the Constitution of the United States gave to us. To the same effect is 3 Cranch, 159 (U. S. vs. More).

I first saw a notice of these decisions of this insular court in the New York Sun of Sunday a week ago. I had the clipping here, but somebody, more interested, possibly, I hope, in the Hawaiians and the constitutional rights than I am, has taken the clipping from my desk and a copy of the three decisions which I had here also. The House ordered them printed as a document.

The present occupant of the chair [Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts] with distinguished ability defended upon the floor of this House the rights, under the Constitution, of the people of Alaska, joining hands with me in their defense when the House committee reporting a codification of laws for that Territory were trying to pass a law declaring that six jurors instead of twelve should constitute a criminal jury. That was in the Fifty-fifth Congress. We saw this evil; we pointed it out. The codifiers of the Alaska laws brought in a report that shocked the House so much that it was most ably opposed, and by no one, I am happy to say, more learnedly than by the distinguished gentleman who now occupies the chair [Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts].

That was a proposition to give to those people up there a jury of six men. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY], with his usual eloquence and great learning, opposed that provision, and in his remarks read as follows from the opinion of Justice Harlan in the Thompson case (170 U. S.):

> The next inquiry referred to is under the original Constitution and under the sixth amendment, is a jury constituted as it was of twelve persons, neither more nor less? This question must be answered in the affirmative.

He also cited other cases.

The court further said—

> That the provisions of the Constitution of the United States relating to the trial by jury in suit at common law apply to the Territories of the United States is no longer an open question.

In Springville vs. Thomas (166 U. S., 707, approved in 170 U. S., 347), the court held that there must be unanimity in the action of the jury in civil cases. The court says:

> In our opinion the seventh amendment secured unanimity in finding a verdict as an essential feature of trial by jury in common-law cases, and the act (Territorial) of Congress could not impart the power to change the constitutional rule and could not be treated as attempting to do so.

The court then added:

> It is equally beyond question that the provisions of the National Constitution relating to trials by jury for crimes and criminal prosecutions apply to the Territories of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I have here the last utterance of the Supreme Court of the United States on this question, found in 174 United States, pages 1 to 5, in which the court says:

> It is beyond doubt at the present day that the provisions of the Constitution of the United States securing the right of trial by jury, whether in civil or criminal cases, are applicable to the District of Columbia.

Citing the Webster (11 How., 437), Callan (127 U. S., 540 to 551), and Thompson cases.

The District of Columbia was first called the "Territory of Columbia" and is now a Territory of the United States, and the people are here protected, this court says, in their fundamental rights by the Constitution as much so as they are in any State. Then, why does not the right of trial by jury apply in Hawaii? Can a court or Congress divest these people of their constitutional rights? Can a statute repeal the Constitution? Can a treaty? Clearly not.

I am not undertaking to criticise individuals outside of the RECORD, but I confess I was shocked to find that in the face of these opinions the supreme court of these islands should have robbed these people of their constitutional rights of trial by jury in the manner I have stated, and that, too, in the face of these decisions. It is in the face, also, of the Congressional action of the Fifty-fifth Congress, declaring as we did that the Constitution applied to Alaska—our "outlying domain," as the court calls it—and that the people there were entitled to twelve jurors and their unanimous verdict in civil and criminal cases.

Mr. MORRIS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GAINES. Yes.

Mr. MORRIS. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Tennessee from what case he first read? Was it in the case of Thompson against Utah?

Mr. GAINES. Thompson against Utah, quoted in Mr. MOODY'S speech correctly.

Mr. MORRIS. Was that the first case the gentleman cited?

Mr. GAINES. And another case I cite from the very first pages of this book, the case of the Capital Traction Company against Hof—a unanimous opinion.

Mr. MORRIS. What report?

Mr. GAINES. One hundred and seventy-four United States. And if the gentleman from Minnesota will permit me, it is a remarkable fact that this Hawaiian court does not allude to the Thompson case, to the Huf case, nor, indeed, to any of these cases, but says that our Constitution was made by "reasonable men," etc., and the old laws of that island applied; that our Constitution did not.

Mr. MORRIS. I do not wish to interrupt the remarks of the gentleman, but simply ask him for my own information, what was the first case that the gentleman read from? Was it the case of Fleming against Baisch?

Mr. GAINES. I simply alluded to that. I have read from quite a number of cases. I have been hurrying along.

Mr. MORRIS. What was the case?

Mr. GAINES. What particular point?

Mr. MORRIS. What is the one you have in your hand?

Mr. GAINES. That is the case of Thompson against Utah (170 U. S.).

Mr. MORRIS. Was that the first case?

Mr. GAINES. That came from the State of Utah, and the lower court was reversed in that case because there were not twelve jurors used in the trial.

Mr. MORRIS. I do not want to take the gentleman's time——

Mr. GAINES. I am perfectly willing to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. MORRIS. What was the title of the first case from which the gentleman read? Was it the case of Fleming against Page?

Mr. GAINES. That was the first case that I simply alluded to, but on another proposition—not jury trials.

Mr. MORRIS. That is what I wanted to know for my own information. I do not desire to interrupt the gentleman at all.

Mr. GAINES. It is a very pleasant interruption. There is no one whose questions I appreciate more than those of the distinguished lawyer from Minnesota, and I dare say that, born as he was in a Southern clime, his blood is warmed by the thought that in these leper-cursed islands, now under the domination of this Republic, the opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States are overruled to rob those people of their lives, liberty, property, and pursuit of happiness, by disregarding the common law of our land and the Constitution, which these high officials are sworn to uphold and support.

Mr. MORRIS. Now, since the gentleman has seen fit to say something about me when I had only asked him a question for information——

Mr. GAINES. I meant that in the pleasantest way.

Mr. MORRIS. I will ask the gentleman a question now. I will ask him what was the exact point involved in the case of Thompson against Utah.

Mr. GAINES. The identical point was that when Utah was a Territory the law was that there must be a trial by twelve jurors, and then when it got to be a State the court undertook to try with less than that number—eight—and the Supreme Court held that it was an ex post facto law, and in addition to that that a jury meant twelve men, no more and no less, and that the State had no power to deprive him of that constitutional right.

Mr. MORRIS. I will ask the gentleman, was not the whole question involved in the case of Thompson against Utah as to whether or not if a person of the territory of the United States, which, when a Territory, had a law requiring that a man should be tried by twelve jurors could in its State constitution, after the crime had been committed under the Territorial act, whether the State constitution should provide that that man could be tried by less than twelve jurors? Was not that the identical question?

Mr. GAINES. That was one point. But in addition to that——

Mr. MORRIS. Is not it the only point?

Mr. GAINES. The court said the State could not deprive him of his right of twelve jurors because that was his right under the Federal Constitution and they could not pass an ex post facto law.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I say that the Constitution and treaty itself gives the Hawaiians the protection of the Constitution of the United States. I remember distinctly that the law by which that territory was annexed provided—and I call the attention of the lawyers of this House briefly to this point—that the laws of that territory shall continue unless they are contrary to the Constitution of the United States or repealed by the act of annexation. That is the substance. If some one had not taken my papers away from here I would read it. The Hawaiian court goes on by saying that the annexation act provided for just exactly what that court did.

Now, I say, Mr. Chairman, that the treaty can not stand in the face of the Constitution, and a statute can not stand in the face of the Constitution, and it has been decided time and time and time again that a treaty stood no higher than a statute, and that a statute stood no higher than a treaty, and that neither could stand when they are opposed by the Constitution of the United States, which this court disregarded.

Now, that court may have gone upon the idea—and it is a very elaborate opinion—that the Constitution has not gone, has not taken sail and gone over to Hawaii. Why, we heard of it down in Puerto Rico yesterday in the House; we hear of it in Guam, where we struck down slavery; but we do not hear of it down in Sulu, where slavery is perpetuated by our treaties.

Why, gentlemen, where and how is the Constitution to go? Is it to go around in spots, in vest pockets; does it go around at the will of a man? Can our military or civil officials stand by and uphold it as they please and when they please? I challenge the attention of this honorable body to these matters.

In Alaska (31 Federal Reporter) we find a poor Indian slave was given his liberty under a writ of habeas corpus. And in another Alaska case, reported in 30 Federal Reporter, 115, and in all the numerous authors which I have here and have not time to cite, the courts hold that the United States has plenary power to control her outlying and internal territory, but within the limitations of the Constitution itself.

That we can not deprive their inhabitant of the right of free speech, the right of free religion, the right of trial by jury, and the right of habeas corpus; nor quarter soldiers in private houses; nor, as I said, can we abridge a single, solitary one of the rights guaranteed to us as American citizens by the Constitution of the United States itself. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

APPENDIX.

Treaty of peace between Spain and the United States, signed at Paris December 10, 1898, ratified by the United States Senate February 6, 1899, by Spain March 19, 1899, exchanged April 11, 1899, at Washington, D. C., and proclaimed by President McKinley April 11, 1899. (U. S. Statutes, volume 30, page 1754, Fifty-fifth Congress.)

ART. IX. The civil rights and political status of the native inhabitants of the territories hereby ceded to the United States shall be determined by the Congress. (Ib., page 1759.)

ART. X. The inhabitants of the territories over which Spain relinquishes or cedes her sovereignty shall be secured in the free exercise of their religion. (Ib., page 1759.)

The genius and character of our institutions are peaceful, and the power to declare war was not conferred upon Congress for the purpose of aggression or aggrandizement, but to enable the General Government to vindicate by arms, if it should become necessary, its own rights and the rights of its citizens. A war, therefore, declared by Congress can never be presumed to be waged for the purpose of conquest or the acquisition of territory; nor does the law declaring the war imply an authority to the President to enlarge the limits of the United States by subjugating the enemy's country. (Fleming vs. Page, 9 How., 614—1850).

If the spirit of liberty is to perish, let it at least expire amidst its votaries and not be sacrificed on a bargain counter.

A power in the General Government to obtain and hold colonies and dependent territories over which they (the Congress) might legislate without restriction would be inconsistent with its own existence in its present form. (Scott vs. Sanford, 19 How., 397.)

In another case that court has said:

"The power of Congress over the Territories is limited by the obvious purposes for which it was conferred, and those purposes are satisfied by measures which prepare the people of the Territories to become States in the Union." (Murphy vs. Ramsey, 114 U. S. Rep., 15.)

"The Constitution was made for the benefit of every citizen of the United States, and there is no citizen, whatever his condition or wherever he may be within the territory of the United States, who has not a right to its protection." (United States vs. Moore, 3 Cranch, 159.)

And in defining the rights of the inhabitants of Territories it said:

"The personal and civil rights of the inhabitants of the Territories are secured to them, as to other citizens, by the principles of constitutional liberty, which restrain all the agencies of government, State and national." (Murphy vs. Ramsey, 114 U. S. Rep., 15. See also Mormon Church vs. United States, 136 U. S. Rep., 1.)

Mr. Cooley, in his Principles of Constitutional Law, page 37, in speaking of our Territorial and the British colonial system, says:

"In this dependence of the Territories upon the central Government there is some outward resemblance to the conditions of the American colonies under the British Crown; but there are some differences which are important and, indeed, vital. The first of these is that the Territorial condition is understood under the Constitution to be merely temporary and preparatory, and the people of the Territory, while it continues, are sure of the right to create and establish State institutions for themselves as soon as the population shall be sufficient and the local conditions suitable; while the British colonial system contains no promise or assurance of any but a dependent government indefinitely."

Mr. Cooley draws a second distinction between our Territorial and the British colonial system at page 37. I read:

"The second is that above given, that the people of the American Territories are guaranteed all the benefits of the principles of constitutional right which protect life, liberty, and property, and may defend them under the law, even as against the action of the Government itself; while in the colonies these principles were subjects of dispute, and if admitted would be within the control of an absolute imperial legislature, which might overrule them at will."

Mr. Cooley draws a third distinction between our Territorial and American colonial systems. He says:

"There is also a difference in respect to taxation, which, though not so striking, is still important. The Territories levy their own taxes for all purposes, and they are never taxed separately for national purposes, but only as parts of the whole country and under the same rules and for the same purposes as are the States. Nor is it intended to realize from them any revenue for the National Treasury beyond what is expended by the United States in their interest." (Page 38.)

Chancellor Kent says:

"All admit," said Chief Justice Marshall, "the constitutionality of a Territorial government." But neither the District of Columbia nor a Territory is a State within the meaning of the Constitution or entitled to claim the privileges secured to the members of the Union. This has been so adjudged by the Supreme Court. Nor will a writ of error or appeal lie from a Territorial court to the Supreme Court unless there be a special statute provision for the purpose. If, therefore, the Government of the United States should carry into execution the project of colonizing the great valley of the Columbia or Oregon River to the west of the Rocky Mountains, it would afford a subject of grave consideration what would be the future civil and political destiny of that country.

"It would be a long time before it would be populous enough to be created into one or more independent States, and in the meantime, upon the doctrine taught by the acts of Congress and even by the judicial decisions of the Supreme Court, the colonists would be in a state of the most complete subordination and as dependent upon the will of Congress as the people of this country would have been upon the King and Parliament of Great Britain if they could have sustained their claim to bind us in all cases whatsoever.

"Such a state of absolute sovereignty on the one hand and of absolute dependence on the other is not congenial with the free and independent spirit of our native institutions, and the establishment of distant Territorial governments, ruled according to will and pleasure, would have a very natural tendency, as all proconsular governments have had, to abuse and oppression." (1 Kent's, page 385.)

Articles V and VI of the treaty of 1819 with Spain for the cession of Florida, 1803 (United States Treaty, Volume, page 1018), are:

"V. The inhabitants of the ceded Territories shall be secured in the free exercise of their religion without any restriction, and all those who may desire to remove to the Spanish dominions shall be permitted to sell or export their effects at any time whatever, without being subject in either case to duties.

"VI. The inhabitants of the territories which His Catholic Majesty cedes to the United States by this treaty shall be incorporated in the union of the United States as soon as may be consistent with the principles of the Federal Constitution, and admitted to the enjoyment of all privileges, rights, and immunities of citizens of the United States." (1 Pet., 511, American Insurance Company vs. Canter; 19 How., 442, Dred Scott case.)

Article III of the Louisiana Treaty (United States Treaty Volume, page 332) provided—

"That the inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of the citizens of the United States; and in the meantime they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess." (19 How., 524, 525 (Catron, J.), approved in 143 U. S., Boyd vs. Thayer.)

The Louisiana purchase covered a million of square miles (Statesman's Manual, page 239), but is, except a very small portion of it, occupied by savages, its natural proprietors. Its inhabitants were principally French and descendants of French, with a few Spanish creoles, Americans, English, and Germans, the whole number amounting to 80,000 or 90,000 inhabitants, including about 40,000 slaves. (Ib.) (Compiled from official sources.)

Another standard authority, Encyclopedia of Commerce and Commercial Navigation, by Harper Brothers (1858), gives the population as follows: "Louisiana, 77,000; Florida, about 10,000; California and New Mexico, 60,000; Texas and Oregon only brought back into the Union citizens who had emigrated thither a short while before."

This makes one white person to each 25 square miles.

Treaties with Mexico.

ARTICLE VIII.

Mexicans now established in Territories previously belonging to Mexico and which remain for the future within the limits of the United States, as defined by the present treaty, shall be free to continue where they now reside or to remove at any time to the Mexican Republic, retaining the property which they possess in the said Territories or disposing thereof and removing the proceed wherever they please, without their being subjected on this account to any contribution, tax, or charge whatever.

Those who shall prefer to remain in the said territories may either retain the title and rights of Mexican citizens or acquire those of citizens of the United States. But they shall be obligated to make their election within one year from the date of the exchange of ratification of this treaty; and those who shall remain in the said territories after the expiration of that year without having declared their intention to retain the character of Mexicans shall be considered to have become citizens of the United States.

In the said territories property of every kind now belonging to Mexicans not established there shall be inviolably respected. The present owners, the heirs of these, and all Mexicans who may hereafter acquire said property by contract shall enjoy with respect to it guarantees equally ample as if the same belonged to citizens of the United States.

"ART. IX. The Mexicans who, in the territories aforesaid, shall not preserve the character of citizens of the Mexican Republic, conformably with what is stipulated in the preceding article, shall be incorporated into the union of the United States, and be admitted at the proper time (to be judged by the Congress of the United States) to the enjoyment of all the rights of citizens of the United States, according to the principles of the Constitution; and in the meantime shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty and property, and secured in the free exercise of their religion without restriction."—(U. S. Treaties, page 694, 1848.)

The Gadsden-Mexican treaty of 1853 (United States Treaty, volume, page 696, Art. V) provided "that all the provisions of the two articles of the Guadelupe-Hidalgo treaty just quoted, and that the same articles should also apply to all the rights of persons and property, both civil and ecclesiastical, within the same, as fully and as effectually as if the said articles were herein again recited and set forth."

In 142 U. S., 183, Knight vs. United States, Mr. Justice Lamar, speaking for a unanimous court, said:

"Upon the acquisition of the territory from Mexico the United States acquired the title to tide lands equally with the title to upland; but with respect to the former they held it only in trust for the future States that might be erected out of said territory." (Knight vs. United States Land Association, 142 U. S., 183; citing also Martin vs. Waddell, 16 Pet., 367; Pollard vs. Hagan, 3 How., 212; Goodtitle vs. Kibbe, 9 How., 471: Mumford vs. Wardwell, 6 Wall., 423; Weber vs. Harbor Commissioners, 18 Wall., 57.)

In 152 U. S., 1, Shively vs. Bowely, Justice Gray said:

"(1) The territories acquired by Congress, whether by deed or cession from the original State or by treaty with a foreign country, are held with the object, as soon as their population and condition justify, of being admitted into the Union as States, upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects; (2) and the title and dominion of the tide waters and the land under them are held with the United States for the benefit of the whole people, and, as this court has often said in cases above cited, 'in trust for the future States.'" * * *

"Upon the acquisition of territory by the United States, whether by cession from one of the States or by treaty with the foreign country, or by discovery and settlement, the same title and dominion passed to the United States, for the benefit of the whole people and in trust for the several States to be ultimately created out of the territory."

Affirmed in 174 U. S., 237, Morris vs. United States, page 57.

In 13 Wallace, 65, cited by Justice Gray, Field, judge, in speaking for the whole court, said on the question of the title to an island half a mile from shore:

"Although the title to the soil under the tide waters of the bay was acquired by the United States by cession from Mexico, equally with the title to the upland, they (United States) held it only in trust for the future State."

This case is specially in point, since we remember that this territory (now California) was acquired by conquest from Mexico.

In Chapin against Bourne (8 Cal.) the court said:

"It (the title to the soil underlying navigable water) belongs to the United States in trust, that might be created out of said Territory and passed to the State of California on her admission (into the Union) by virtue of her sovereignty."

In a still later case (54 Cal., 455), Leroy vs. Dunkery, touching upon the title to certain tide-water lands, we find the most apt adjudication, the court deciding in favor of the State. The court said:

"From the date of the treaty of 1848 the portion of the tide lands in controversy was held by the United States in trust for the future State. * * * The question here is whether from the treaty up to the admission of California into the Union the United States held the legal title to these particular lands in trust for the State government which should be organized; or whether the United States Government held them in full ownership, freed of any trust in favor of the future State, and for its own exclusive use and benefit as a military reservation, and since continues to so hold them."

There the issue was made that the United States Government owned the island as a military reservation and had acquired it as such when the treaty was made with Mexico.

Cooley on Principles of International Law, page 187, says:

"The Constitution also provided that new States may be admitted by Congress into the Union; but whether they should be formed of territory at that time belonging to the States, or from territory that might thereafter be acquired, or taken in as existing States previously independent, was not expressly determined by that instrument. By the ordinance of 1787, however, which the Constitution left in force, it had been agreed that States not exceeding five might be formed from the Northwest Territory and received into the Union; and it may be assumed as unquestionable that the constitutional provision contemplated that the territory then under the dominion of the United States, but not within the limits of any one of them, was in due time to be formed and organized into States and admitted into the Union, as has since in many cases been done."

I desire to call especial attention to the language which follows:

"Indeed, it could never have been understood that any territory which by purchase, cession, or conquest should at any time come under the control of the United States should permanently be held in a Territorial condition, and the new States, which have been formed of territory acquired by treaty, must be supposed to have been received into the Union in strict compliance with the Constitution." (Page 188.)

"And when territory is acquired, the right to suffer States to be formed therefrom and to receive them into the Union must follow of course, not only because the Constitution confers the power to admit new States without restriction, but also because it would be inconsistent with institutions founded on the fundamental idea of self-government that the Federal Government should retain territory under its own imperial rule and deny the people the customary local institutions." (Cooley's Principles of Constitutional Law, 170.)

Article III of the Russian treaty of 1867 (United States Treaty, volume, 941) is as follows:

"The inhabitants of the ceded territory, according to their choice, reserving their national allegiance, may return to Russia within three years; but if they should prefer to remain in the ceded territory, they, with the exception of uncivilized native tribes, shall be admitted to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States, and shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion. The uncivilized tribes shall be subject to such laws and regulations as the United States may from time to time adopt in regard to aboriginal tribes of that country."

The fourteenth amendment had been adopted by Congress and was before the States for ratification when this treaty was concluded.

FOR WHAT IS TERRITORY ACQUIRED?

Justice Deady, in the case from Alaska (30 Fed. Rep., 115), after stating that the Federal Government has the power to acquire territory by treaty and conquest, citing 1 Peters, 542; 19 How., 443 (Dred Scott case); 2 Story, section 1344, said:

"The power to enlarge the number and limits of the United States by the admission of new States into the Union is also expressly given to Congress. In the construction of this power it has been practically held to authorize the acquisition of territory not then qualified for such admission, and the government of the same by Congress in the meantime, and until it is deemed fitted therefor.

"In the exercise of this power, however, Congress can not do or authorize any act or pass any law forbidden by the Constitution, as suspending the writ of habeas corpus in the time of peace; passing a bill of attainder or ex post facto law; quartering soldiers in a house without the consent of the owner in time of peace; making a law respecting the establishment of religion; but it may exercise any legislative power not expressly forbidden to it by the Constitution, and to this there may be a further limit that the same shall not be inconsistent with the spirit and genius of that instrument, nor contrary to the purpose for which territory may be acquired. Subject to these limitations the manner in which this power can be exercised rests in the discretion of Congress."

See also 31 Federal Reporter, where an Indian slave under the writ of habeas corpus was given his liberty.

In the case of the Mormon Church vs. United States (136 U. S., 42), the court says:

"The power to acquire territory other than the territory northwest of the Ohio River (which belonged to the United States at the adoption of the Constitution) is derived from the treaty-making power and the power to declare and carry on war. The power to make acquisitions of territory by conquest, by treaty, and cession is an incident of national sovereignty. The territory of Louisiana, when acquired from France, and the territories west of the Rocky Mountains, when acquired from Mexico, became the absolute property and domain of the United States, subject to such conditions as the Government in its diplomatic negotiations had seen fit to accept relating to the rights of the people then inhabiting these territories."

At page 44 the court quotes from the opinion in the case of Murphy vs. Ramsey (114 U. S.), where it is said:

"The people of the United States, as sovereign owners of the national territories, have supreme power over them and their inhabitants. In the exercise of this sovereign domain they are represented by the Government of the United States, to whom all powers of government over that subject are delegated, subject only to such restrictions as are expressed in the Constitution or necessarily implied in its terms.

"The right of local self-government as known to our system as a constitutional franchise belongs, under the Constitution, to the States and to the people thereof by whom the Constitution was ordained, and to whom by its terms all power not conferred by it upon the Government of the United States was expressly reserved. The personal and civil rights of the inhabitants of the Territories are secured to them, as to other citizens, by the principles of constitutional liberty, which restrain all the agencies of government, State and national."

Approved in 170 U. S., 349, Thompson's case.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York, the chairman of the committee, agreed to yield me ten minutes' time for the benefit of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT]. We are advised that he can not be in the Hall at present on account of committee service. If there is any gentleman on the other side who will proceed for a short time, it will be all right; if not, we will have to forego.

The CHAIRMAN. If no member addresses the Chair, the Clerk will read the bill.

Mr. LITTLE. I think the chairman of the committee should be present. I do not see him.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has stepped out. The Clerk will read the bill by paragraphs.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

For pay of one clerk to Superintendent of Indian Schools, $1,000.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike that out of the bill on the ground that it does not belong in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman mean to make the point of order, or does he move to strike the paragraph out?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I think the chairman of the committee will concede that it ought to go out and go into the legislative bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. This clerk is employed at times outside of the Indian Office. He is employed with a commissioner and has to go with the commissioner wherever he goes. He does not occupy the same position that an ordinary clerk in the office does; if he did, I would concede that the gentleman is right.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I suggest that we appropriate for one clerk, and the Committee on Indian Affairs is appropriating for another. One clerk is appropriated for in this bill and one on the legislative bill. We appropriate for one clerk in the legislative bill and the Committee on Indian Affairs in their bill, and I suggest that the two clerks ought to go together on the legislative bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the gentleman from Indiana will give me his assurance that this clerk will be provided for in the legislative bill, I am entirely willing it should go out of this bill.

Mr. HEMENWAY. We will certainly take care of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then, Mr. Chairman, I do not oppose the motion of the gentleman from Indiana.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted, I desire to say that I have found a paper which I wanted to comment upon in my remarks and make a part of my speech. I mislaid it; and inasmuch as it does not bear directly upon what I said, I want permission to print it as a part of my remarks. It shows that in Florida, Louisiana and Mexico plus California, and the other purchases, excluding Alaska and Hawaii, we provided expressly for statehood in the treaties and all the fundamental rights we enjoy under the Constitution, and I desire to place in the RECORD some extracts from those treaties showing these important facts. Quite a number of requests have been made to me to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the general leave given by the House to-day, the gentleman has that liberty.

Mr. GAINES. I think that only applied to the subject under discussion. I discussed jury trials.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to employ practical farmers and practical stockmen in addition to the agency farmers now employed, at wages not exceeding $65 each per month, to superintend and direct farming and stock raising among such Indians as are making effort for self-support, $65,000.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do so for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee why the proviso was omitted that was in the law for many years?

Mr. SHERMAN. About adjoining States?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. SHERMAN. We thought as good service could be obtained with it out as with it in. The old proviso was that the farmer should be an actual resident during the two preceding years prior to the appointment of the State or Territory in which he was to be employed, or of an adjoining State, and that he should have been actually engaged in farming during that time. We thought a man who had not been engaged in farming for the last two years might be as well qualified as one who had, and that a man living in Iowa quite as competent to go on a reservation in Kansas as a man who lived in Nebraska.

Mr. CANNON. I think that is all right if he is a farmer. My recollection is that this proviso went in many years ago because it was found that barbers and others were appointed as farmers who hardly knew a turnip from an onion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the gentleman is in error. I think that proviso was put in in the Senate three or four years ago upon the motion of the Senator from South Dakota to meet an objection which he raised that the then Secretary of the Interior was bringing farmers from Georgia to perform work in South Dakota; not that he was bringing barbers, but that he was bringing farmers from that State.

Mr. CANNON. I think the facts will show that some barbers played farmers; but if the chairman of the committee is quite sure that this is for the benefit of the service, I shall not interpose any further objection, because I think the whole matter of furnishing farmers is a good deal of a farce.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

APACHES, KIOWAS, AND COMANCHES.

For pay of employees, as provided by treaty of October 21, 1867, $6,000.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I want to reserve a point of order on that. I believe these items are not in the law of the current year.

Mr. SHERMAN. They are not in the law under treaty stipulations. They are in at another place, under the head of "gratuities." I do not know how the error originally arose, that they were provided for under the head of gratuities instead of under the treaty head. The treaty stipulation provides for this, and it should go in under the head of "treaty stipulations" and not under the head of "gratuities."

Mr. CANNON. That is what I want to call the gentleman's attention to. I do not think we are bound under treaty to make this appropriation. Now, referring to volume 15, page 585, article 10, it says:

In lieu of all sums of money or other annuities provided to be paid to the Indians herein named, under the treaty of October 18, 1865, made at the mouth of the "Little Arkansas," and under all treaties made previous thereto, the United States agrees to deliver at the agency house on the reservation herein named, on the 15th day of October of each year, for thirty years—

Then it runs along for over half a page, and there is nothing in it about furnishing pay for employees.

Mr. SHERMAN. The gentleman is not referring to the treaty mentioned in the bill of October, 1867. He is referring to the treaty of 1865.

Mr. CANNON. I am referring to the one referred to in the Book of Estimates, and also the one mentioned in the bill. I am referring to volume 15, page 585, article 10.

Mr. SHERMAN. Possibly I may be in error.

Mr. CANNON. I think the gentleman is.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest that we pass over the item embraced in lines 17 to 23, inclusive, without prejudice, and I will look this matter up.

Mr. CANNON. I should like to be here when it comes up again.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will not call it up in the gentleman's absence.

Mr. CANNON. One remark further.

These gifts or gratuities of money to these Indians—who always exact everything coming to them by way of annuities, support, and that kind of thing, and which, I was almost ready to say, in most instances are more than sufficient to support them in better style than the skilled mechanic can support himself—make quite large demands upon the Treasury, and I do not believe that unless there is some treaty obligation or some absolute necessity for granting these gratuities we ought to proceed further in that direction. I am content that the matter shall go over now, in order that the gentleman from New York may look into it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, this clause will be passed over without prejudice.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

CHIPPEWAS OF MINNESOTA, REIMBURSABLE.

Advance interest to the Chippewa Indians in Minnesota, as required by section 7 of "An act for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota," approved January 14, 1889, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, in the manner required by said act (reimbursable), $90,000.

Mr. CANNON. I should like to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill, if he has the information at hand, how much has been appropriated in this way for the Chippewa Indians—"reimbursable?"

Mr. SHERMAN. On pages 35-39 of the Secretary's annual report for 1898 there is a full statement in reference to this whole fund. That statement shows that there has been appropriated for all purposes under the Chippewa act, including surveys, appraising, and everything of that kind, $2,060,000 up to this time. I have a later statement, dated January 19 of the present year, showing that the total disbursements up to the 1st of last September were $2,315,000. This same report of the Secretary for 1898 shows that the total receipts have been something less than $1,000,000. The supplemental report, which I have just received, shows that the receipts during the time between the date of the previous report and the 1st of last September were between three hundred thousand and four hundred thousand dollars—in exact figures, $355,293.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman believe that the Treasury will ever be reimbursed for these amounts?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; I do not.

Mr. CANNON. Well, can the gentleman suggest how much longer we are to go on in this style of appropriation in support of these Indians, who have timber which, if handled and sold to the best advantage, would, I apprehend, pay all this money and more? Are we ever to avail ourselves of such sales, or what is to become of this property?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Chippewa act of 1889 provides that the lands and the timber thereon shall be disposed of and prescribes the disposition that shall be made of the fund arising from such sales; and it is left discretionary with Congress to use this fund, or a certain amount of it—one-fourth—in providing for schools and various other things. The first provision is that—

Congress may, in its discretion, from time to time during a period of fifty years appropriate for the purpose of promoting civilization and self-support among the said Indians a portion of said principal sum, not exceeding 5 per cent thereof—

That is, 5 per cent of $3,000,000—and the United States shall for the benefit of said Indians advance to them such interest, amounting to the sum of $90,000 annually, etc., counting from the time when the allotments were made.

The act contemplates the accumulation of a fund of $3,000,000 in the Treasury, but it is mandatory upon us to appropriate $90,000 per annum prior to the time that the fund reaches the sum of $3,000,000.

Mr. CURTIS. Allow me to suggest to the chairman of the committee that if some change was made in regard to the disposition of the timber belonging to these Indians, there would be no question but that a very large fund would be created for their benefit and that all this money might be reimbursed. But if that timber is to continue to be disposed of as at present, the Government will realize very little in the way of reimbursement.

Mr. SHERMAN. We suspended action upon present lines in the last appropriation bill, and called upon the Secretary to make investigation through a special agent and to report fully, with such recommendations as he might desire to make, in reference to a change of the statute providing for the disposition of this timber land.

Mr. CANNON. I observe in the very next paragraph, not yet read, there is a continuation of these appropriations:

To enable the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, to carry out an act entitled "An act for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota," approved January 14, 1889, namely, the purchase of material and employment of labor for the erection of houses for Indians; for the purchase of agricultural implements, stock, and seeds, breaking and fencing land; for payment of expenses of delegations of Chippewa Indians to visit the White Earth Reservation; for the erection and maintenance of day and industrial schools; for subsistence and for pay of employees; for pay of commissioner and his expenses, and for removal of Indians and for their allotments, to be reimbursed to the United States out of the proceeds of sale of their lands, $100,000.

Now, is that $100,000 provided for also in the treaty?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is discretionary, not mandatory that we appropriate that sum. But the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. EDDY], a member of the committee, who is very familiar with the conditions up in that country, stated to us in the discussion of this proposition—and I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that originally in the committee we reduced this appropriation from $100,000 to $50,000—the gentleman from Minnesota, from his personal knowledge of conditions there, said that it was absolutely essential to appropriate for these Indians at least $100,000, in order to keep them from starving and freezing to death, and that if we did not provide for them here under this reimbursable clause, where there might be some chance of getting it back, we should be forced to provide for them under the gratuity act; and the committee thought it was rather better to take a chance of getting it back some time than to absolutely give it away now.

Mr. CANNON. I want to call my friend's attention to the fact that, as I understand it, these Chippewas have what seems to be a pretty valuable reservation up toward the head waters of the Mississippi River, with large amounts of timber that is not being sold to any great extent. I will not say that it is being trespassed upon, because I have no direct personal knowledge, but these Chippewas, as I understand it, have had allotments made to them.

Mr. SHERMAN. To some of them, but by no means to all.

Mr. CANNON. And now that they are full-fledged American citizens, "men and brethren"——

Mr. SHERMAN. Some of them.

Mr. CANNON. Exercising the rights of the franchise, now I would be glad to know that at some time or other those citizens that vote and carry this burden of citizenship, helping to control the destinies of the Republic, would cease to receive grants from the Treasury, where other citizens do not receive grants. I do not know what the period of guardianship is to be. It strikes me it ought to begin to cease when you clothe them with full citizenship and they exercise the right of the ballot; and that if they be poor, the burden be thrown upon the State wherein they reside and whose destinies they help to control, the same as in the State of New York and elsewhere.

Mr. CURTIS. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that if timber of these Indians was properly disposed of they would not be poor.

Mr. SHERMAN. The burden that is imposed upon us by the care of these and other Indians, the gentleman well knows, is a self-imposed burden. It is not a legal, but rather a moral obligation. We can shift it and throw it off if we desire to, but there are no inconsiderable number of people in the country who believe that our moral obligation is too great to throw aside this burden, which, as the gentleman knows, is not increasing, but decreasing. Why, since the beginning of my service upon this committee, and that is not a great many years ago, but half a dozen years ago, the appropriation bill was from two to five million dollars more than it now is.

During the time it has been my pleasure to preside over the committee the bill has decreased every single year, and is less this year than it ever was before. This burden does not increase, but decreases year by year. We are paying less. We shift the amount that we expend for these people. Less is paid for rations and more for books. We are educating them as fast as we can. We are educating more than 25,000, where twenty-five years ago we did not educate 5,000, and as the light of civilization and education is spread among them we have to do so much less in the way of rations, clothes, and material help. The burden, as I said before, is not increasing, but is steadily decreasing.

Mr. CANNON. Now, if my friend will allow me, the statement which he makes is a very interesting one. But to come down to the specific appropriation in hand, I understand that we have a treaty with the Chippewas, and that under that treaty, which extinguishes the title to a part of their lands, we virtually took possession, for the purpose of selling the timber of a portion or all of the remainder of their lands, and that that timber, if sold and handled properly or halfway properly, would absolutely reimburse the Government for every dollar that we have advanced. But it is not being done. Up in Minnesota, near the head waters of the Mississippi, is that magnificient timber.

Ill-advised people, perhaps without being fully advised, intimate that trespassers get away with great quantities of that timber; that enterprising citizens of the United States—I will not say of Minnesota, but perhaps of adjacent States—with the hope of gain, manage to get hold of this timber, and Mr. Indian does not get a great deal of it; that under this same treaty these Indians in great part have taken their lands in severalty and have become clothed with citizenship, voting for members of Congress, voting as every other citizen does within the boundaries of that State; that the ill-advised people probably take the timber on the one hand, the Indian votes on the other, and the Treasury of the United States support these voting American citizens.

Now, that is not a desirable condition. My belief is that when the Indian is clothed with citizenship, casts the ballot, and takes allotments of land in severalty, he ought to work out his own salvation just as other American citizens do, and it is a principle which lies at the very foundation of citizenship that each tub must stand on its own bottom. And if, through misfortune, disease, or vice, any portion of the citizens of a State fall by the wayside, then the respective counties and States should bear that burden; and when they do that, it is intelligently borne and minimized; but as long as the Federal Treasury bears it, I suppose it will go on bearing it to the end of time, the State shuffling off the burden, the county shuffling off the burden, and in the meantime the parties receiving the relief.

The Clerk read as follows:

QUAPAWS.

For education, during the pleasure of the President, per third article of treaty of May 13, 1833, $1,000; for blacksmith and assistants, and tools, iron, and steel for blacksmith shop, per same article and treaty, $500; in all, $1,500: Provided, That the $1,000 of this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be expended, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, for the support and maintenance of three or more public schools on the Quapaw Reservation, at such places as may be provided by the Quapaw Nation: And provided, That the present industrial school on said reservation shall be consolidated with the Seneca Industrial School at Wyandotte, in the Quapaw Agency: And provided, That the building and furniture now used for school purposes at the present Industrial Quapaw School, except such as may be required for the consolidated school at Wyandotte, shall be turned over to the Quapaw Nation by the Secretary of the Interior for the use of schools on the Quapaw Reservation: And provided, That such of said buildings as may not be required for a public school, where they now stand, may be removed by said nation to suitable places on said reservation, and $500 of the amount hereby appropriated shall be turned over to the Quapaw Nation to pay for the removal and repairing of said buildings.

Mr. CANNON. I should like to ask the gentleman from New York, chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, how much longer, in his judgment, this appropriation for the education of the Quapaws should be continued?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is rather difficult for me to answer that, Mr. Chairman. The Quapaw Indians are not in a deplorable condition, I am pleased to state. They are in rather a better condition than a very large number of our Indians. This is a provision under a treaty that we shall appropriate as long as it pleases the President that we should. The estimate comes to us through the Interior Department and the Treasury Department, asking for this appropriation, from which we must assume that it is the pleasure of the President that the appropriation still be made. It seems to me that this is one of the items that it ought not to be necessary to continue for any great number of years further.

Mr. CANNON. I understand that it is during the pleasure of the President, under the third article of the treaty, for education. Now, I think if Congress did not make the appropriation, the President would be pleased not to expend the money.

Mr. SHERMAN. Whether he would be pleased or not, I suppose he would be forced not to expend it.

Mr. CANNON. He would be forced not to expend it. Now, I have a general understanding that the Quapaws have had their lands completely allotted to them. Somebody said to me, and I am quoting what was said, and I think it is reliable, that they have 200 acres of splendid land each—land probably as productive as eastern Kansas land, or superior to some of the eastern Kansas land.

Mr. CURTIS. Not superior.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Kansas says that the land is not superior, but I suspect it is nearly as good as Missouri and Illinois land.

Mr. BENTON. What lands have you reference to?

Mr. CANNON. The Quapaws'.

Mr. BENTON. They are pretty good lands.

Mr. CANNON. Are they out of debt?

Mr. CURTIS. There owe about twenty-four hundred dollars.

Mr. CANNON. How many of them are there?

Mr. BENTON. Two or three or four hundred of them, all together.

Mr. CANNON. Well, if there are 400 of them—and that is the largest number the gentleman mentions—having 200 acres of land apiece, owing twenty-four hundred dollars, and that is all, having their lands in severalty and good lands, I submit that it is about time we stopped paying them.

Mr. SHERMAN. There are 251 of them.

Mr. CANNON. It is $1,500. I thought it was a much larger amount; but, large or small, I do not know of any population of 400 people that are so well fixed.

Mr. BENTON. I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that he forgets that Congress a few years ago did what I think was a matter of very doubtful propriety. They permitted these Indians to sell part of their land. A good many of them have foolishly parted with their lands; and while a good many are in very good position, a good many of them are not.

Mr. CANNON. I thought they had not power to alienate their lands.

Mr. BENTON. Not when first allotted, but subsequent legislation allowed it.

Mr. CURTIS. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that the provision for the Quapaw school is changed somewhat. The Government has been maintaining a school which has cost the Government $6,000 or $8,000 a year, and it is changed by providing for the establishment of three day schools, and it will save the Government from four to five thousand dollars a year. It is true the Quapaws are very well off; but it must be remembered that the property they own is not taxable, and that no provision has been made for erecting school buildings on the reservation owned by them. They ask for these three day schools and a consolidation of the Quapaw and Wyandotte school. I think so long as the land is not taxable, and the Government can save $4,000 a year or more and only give them a thousand dollars to maintain three day schools, that it would be a good change for the Government, and I think we ought to maintain the day schools at least until their lands are taxable.

Mr. CANNON. How long have they been owning lands—twenty-five years?

Mr. CURTIS. They took their allotments a good many years ago.

The Government is saving by this provision $4,000 or $5,000 each year. You are abolishing one large school, which necessitates six or eight employees all the time, and if you authorize the use of the $1,000, as provided in this bill, you will save the amount heretofore stated, which is taken out of the general school fund.

Mr. CANNON. The only object of my challenging the appropriation is to draw the attention of the House to some of these items, not by way of criticisms of the Committee on Indian Affairs at all, or upon any gentleman in connection with it, but to suggest to the gentleman, and suggest to the House, that it seems to me the time has come where people are able to bear the burdens that they should cease to be wards of the Government. It is for the benefit of the Treasury on the one hand, and adds the blessing to the people on the other that they depend upon themselves. That is all I want to say.

The Clerk read as follows:

For interest on $78,340.41, at 5 per cent per annum, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior for the erection of houses, improvement of their allotments of land, purchase of stock, agricultural implements, seeds, and other beneficial objects, $3,917.02; in all, $44,162.47.

Mr. TONGUE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the amendment which I have forwarded to the Clerk's desk.

Insert, at end of line 24, page 31, after the word "cents," the following:

"ALSEA AND SILETZ INDIANS.

"The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed, on the passage of this act, to pay to such Alsea and other Indians on the Siletz Reservation, in Oregon, parties to an agreement made October 31, 1892, ratified by the act of Congress approved August 15, 1894 (twenty-eighth Statutes, page 323), as shall be found to be competent and capable of managing and taking care of their own affairs their pro rata shares of the permanent fund of $100,000, appropriated by the said act of August 15, 1894, and now to their credit in the Treasury of the United States."

Mr. TONGUE. Mr. Chairman, just one word upon that question. We are now dealing with that portion of the bill that is appropriating money for carrying out treaty obligations with the several tribes of Indians in different portions of the United States. In 1894 a treaty was made between the United States and the Alsea and Siletz Indians, and in the provisions of the treaty, as confirmed by Congress, $100,000 was appropriated to pay these Indians for lands purchased from them by the Government. I will read the provision in the treaty, Mr. Chairman:

That in case the Secretary of the Interior may at any time be satisfied that any of said Indians are fully competent and capable of managing and taking care of their full pro rata of said purchase money, and that it will be to their interest to receive the same, and that other portions of said Indians are not so capable and competent, then he shall recommend to Congress that sufficient amount of such principal sum so held in trust as provided in section 2 of this agreement shall be appropriated to pay the full pro rata of such competent and capable Indians of such principal fund, and when the same shall be paid and receipted for personally by each Indian so paid, then such Indians shall have no further interests in said trust fund.

The Secretary of the Interior has recommended, in accordance with that treaty and the act of Congress, that provision should be made authorizing him to pay their pro rata portion of this fund to 306 Indians. It is to carry out the provisions of that treaty. As I understand, we are now under the provisions of the bill appropriating money for carrying out treaty stipulations, and I offer this amendment, and I think it is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York care to be heard further?

Mr. CANNON. Has the gentleman from Oregon the communication from the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. TONGUE. I have.

Mr. SHERMAN. Under the gentleman's statement, Mr. Chairman, I think it is in order under treaty stipulation, under a special head of itself. I agree with him about that. I withdraw the point of order, for I do not think it is well taken.

Mr. TONGUE. A few words, Mr. Chairman, in explanation of the amendment and the class of Indians for whom this provision is sought to be made. They have been taught in the schools and educated in the English language for a great many years. In the report as to the condition of the various Indians I find that the entire population is given as wearing citizens' dress. Out of 486 of the population, 430 talk English. There are none except those who live in houses. The number of rations issued by the Government during the last year to all of these Indians only numbered 30. There is about $2,000 expended in religious and church work.

Of the 486 Indians there were no criminals of any kind during the year. I visited the Indians, and a meeting was held and this matter was discussed. The Indians selected their speaker and they talked in English, and they explained their matters thoroughly, intelligently, and well. Their lands have been allotted to them, 80 acres, and some of them have more than that. They are in a productive country, where they farm reasonably well, where they are making their own living, but are hampered for lack of stock and agricultural implements. There is $100,000 standing to their credit.

Mr. LITTLE. I desire to ask the gentleman if he has the views of the Indian Office on this subject?

Mr. TONGUE. I have.

Mr. LITTLE. I hope the gentleman will give them to us.

Mr. TONGUE. I will do so before I conclude my remarks. The Indians are being paid 5 per cent on the money, which brings them about $11 each. But that will not buy a cow, it will not buy a plow, a wagon, or a horse. It practically amounts to nothing; it comes in little drafts. With this provision they would get about $200 each, and they could equip their farms with stock and put in capital, enabling them better to work their land, and that is the reason they desire to have the sum paid in full. It would cut the string between these Indians and the Government. They are capable of taking care of themselves, and they will take care of themselves, and will cease looking to the Government for help, and will learn reliance.

Mr. LITTLE. How much money does this involve?

Mr. TONGUE. One hundred thousand dollars has been appropriated and belongs to them, and stands to their credit in the Treasury. This simply authorizes the Secretary of the Interior, in accordance with the provision of that treaty, to pay each one of these Indians, whom he finds capable of taking care of the amount, the full amount due him. It involves no expenditure of money by the Government; it is simply giving the Indians what belongs to them instead of the United States acting as a loan agent and paying them 5 per cent interest.

Mr. LITTLE. How much does the annual payment amount to?

Mr. TONGUE. The amount is $100,000 and the population 486—a little over $11 apiece at 5 per cent interest.

Mr. CURTIS. Have they an Indian agent there?

Mr. TONGUE. Yes.

Mr. CURTIS. Is there a school for them?

Mr. TONGUE. Yes.

Mr. RIDGELY. I did not catch the reading of the amendment. Does it propose to advance the payment of interest to these Indians for some years to come?

Mr. TONGUE. No; it simply proposes to pay the principal to such Indians as, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior, are competent to manage their own affairs. The Secretary has reported, after carefully examining the matter, that in his judgment 306 of these Indians are capable of taking care of themselves. Here is his letter:

These Indians are now citizens and taxpayers of the State of Oregon, and I am satisfied from the information I have that the 306 named in the schedule submitted by the inspector are fully competent and capable to manage and take care of their full pro rata of the said permanent fund and that such pro rata fund ought to be paid to them now.

I therefore have the honor to inclose a draft of an item to be incorporated in the next Indian appropriation bill to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to pay, immediately upon the passage of the act, to such members of the tribe as may be found fully "competent and capable" their pro rata shares of the said permanent fund, and to urgently recommend that the item be so incorporated and enacted into law.

That is the item which I have offered as an amendment to this bill.

Mr. RIDGELY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. TONGUE. Certainly.

Mr. RIDGELY. In case these Indians, or any of them, should fail to take care of themselves, what will be the result? Will they not fall back upon the Government? Will they not appeal to us again for help?

Mr. TONGUE. These Indians are full citizens; lands have been allotted to them; they are voters. As I understand, the Government will be under no more obligation to take care of them if they should become paupers than to take care of any other citizens of the county. The county understands that if these people should cut loose from the Government and become paupers it will be obliged to take care of them; and it is willing to take that responsibility.

Mr. RIDGELY. What the gentleman says may be correct as to the legal status of these Indians; but in view of our general policy in the past toward the Indians, would there not be an appeal to us to take care of them again as wards of the nation?

Mr. TONGUE. They have rich lands and plenty of them. There is no more indication of their becoming paupers than the white people.

Mr. RIDGELY. But we know that a great many white people become paupers.

Mr. TONGUE. If we were going to take care of them, I do not understand that any appropriations for rations, for agencies, or schools are taken out of this sum. The mere amount of $11 a year would not support a pauper or a sick man.

Mr. RIDGELY. I understand under the gentleman's provision we would simply provide for a disbursement of this trust fund.

Mr. TONGUE. Yes; and I think these Indians will be less liable to become paupers if this money is paid to them than otherwise. This money would help them to stock and equip their farms; and they will thus be taught lessons of self-reliance so as not longer to look to the Government for support.

Mr. RIDGELY. I am not prepared to object to the amendment; I am simply seeking information.

Mr. TONGUE. The citizens by whom these Indians are surrounded—with whom they live, the agents and employees on the reservation—the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and the Secretary of the Interior all favor the proposition. For the purpose of ascertaining the condition of affairs in reference to this matter I have talked with these people, and I am fully convinced that this is a wise provision and ought to be adopted. I hope it will receive the approval of the chairman of the committee and of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I exceedingly regret to oppose any proposition offered by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. TONGUE]. But I must oppose the principle of putting our hands into the Treasury at the request of any of the Indians who have trust funds still there, and permitting them to take the principal of those trust funds and spend it. As long as it is there we know that they will receive the interest on it every year, as the treaty may provide. They have now a certain amount which they know they can fall back upon year by year to help them out in case of emergency. To that extent we are relieved of any liability to be called on for assistance in supporting these Indians.

I do believe, Mr. Chairman, that not only in this instance, but in every case of this kind, it is our duty to oppose such action as is proposed by the gentleman from Oregon; and I sincerly hope that this Committee of the Whole will not open the door to this line of action, permitting Indians upon their own application to withdraw their trust funds from the Treasury. I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Oregon will be voted down.

Mr. TONGUE. Only a few words more. I have a great deal of respect for my friend from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] and a great deal of respect for his judgment in reference to these matters. But I must insist, Mr. Chairman, that the people who live near these Indians, who have spent thirty or forty years in their neighborhood, who have had business dealings with them, who would be subject to any disorders that might be created if the Indians were not properly managed, or if they misbehaved, are entitled to be heard upon a matter of this kind affecting persons with whom they are perfectly well acquainted.

The gentleman from New York has not had personal experience with these people, and possibly he does not recognize that these Indians have been subject to the influences of civilization for thirty or forty years. They talk well; they dress well; they farm well; they work well, and they vote with reasonable intelligence, entering into a pretty fair political argument on both sides of the question.

Now, I am prepared to say for these people that it is not subjecting them to a good influence when you teach them that for all time in some way or other they must fall back on this Government to take care of them. In my judgment one of the worst influences pervading the country to-day is that which prompts too many of our people to insist that somehow or other, in some shape, it is the business and duty of this Government to take care of them.

I do not believe it wise to continue to subject these Indians to the influence of such a feeling. As they become civilized we ought to teach them lessons of self-reliance. Let them understand that since the Government has elevated them to a condition of civilization, they must now depend upon themselves—must now manage their business in their own way. If the gentleman from New York wants to make them paupers, for God's sake let him continue to deal with them as if they must look to the Government month after month and year after year; let him make them feel that if they get into trouble—if they get sick or drunk—they may look to the Government to help them out.

In my judgment, the proper policy is to cut the leading strings and teach them to rely upon themselves, not to expect Congress or the American people to help them out. Those who know these people as I know them and as my neighbors know them are willing to trust them, and I think that on a matter of this kind, affecting us and not affecting remote communities like those in which my friend from New York lives, our opinion is entitled to respect.

Mr. CURTIS. As I understand, these Indians are under an agent?

Mr. TONGUE. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. If they are under the care of an agent, then it would seem to be more important that the agent should be discharged, and that, with a view to their best interests, they should not be subjected to endless guardianship, than that this $100,000 should be distributed among 400 of them—men, women, and children.

I have no personal knowledge in regard to these Indians, but I know this, that when they get $200 apiece their neighbors probably will get a part of it.

Mr. TONGUE. It will probably be expended in buying cattle, horses, sheep, etc.

Mr. CANNON. And in the payment of debts, no doubt. If these Indians are good farmers, if they are so intelligent and competent, they can not very greatly need this money. On the other hand, if they are improvident they would probably spend it in a way that would do them but little good. They can not have their cake and eat it, too. If we should now give them $200 apiece, and thereby this trust fund should be exhausted, some of our good people who have nothing else to do than to "stand with the Lord" and take care of people who, in their judgment, need taking care of (with some of them, not many, this is a profession) will no doubt urge that we should make further appropriation for these Indians, take care of them through an agent, send their children to school, and do all this in the name of humanity, because their ancestors owned the soil before our ancestors ever knew there was any soil here. So we shall have to shoulder the responsibility again and appropriate money for their support.

Mr. CURTIS. I should like to call the attention of the House to what the agent says in reference to this payment. He says in his report:

In the month of March the annual payment of interest on trust funds was made, amounting in the aggregate to $5,852. This payment was a great relief, and especially to the old Indians, who during the long winter had exhausted their stock of subsistence.

So it would seem from this report that these payments are of some benefit to this tribe, and I therefore hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. HEMENWAY. How many male Indians over 21 years of age are there?

Mr. CURTIS. There are 259 males and 227 females.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Do you know the number over 21 years of age?

Mr. CURTIS. That is the number of those over 21. The number of children between the ages of 6 and 18 is—males 64, females 45; total school population, 109.

Mr. HEMENWAY. What was the amount of interest divided the last time?

Mr. CURTIS. Five thousand eight hunded and fifty-three dollars.

Mr. HEMENWAY. That virtually went to the 221 males.

Mr. CURTIS. It goes to the head of the family. It might be a male or a female.

Mr. HEMENWAY. But the heads of the families had the use of that money.

Mr. CURTIS. Yes.

Mr. HEMENWAY. And if they had $200 per head distributed, some of the families would have quite a sum of money, no doubt a thousand or twelve hundred dollars.

Mr. TONGUE. Will the gentleman allow me to call his attention to a provision that he has overlooked?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. TONGUE. The Secretary of the Interior recommends the payment to 306 individuals, leaving these old people, nearly 200 of them, whose money he proposes to retain and pay out in the manner that he has paid it heretofore.

Mr. RIDGELY. Mr. Chairman, I submit that if these people are yet under an agent, and this amendment is to disburse to certain Indians a fund that is virtually in a Government savings bank to their credit, and as a protection to these Indians, as well as to the people of the nation, who have them to protect as wards, it would be better to follow the judgment of the chairman of the committee and retain this fund on deposit for their and our mutual protection.

If I understand the amendment, it not only disburses the $200 for the head of a family, but for each member of the family, regardless of age, and still leaves them under an agent, practically as wards of the nation. I believe it best to retain this money on deposit for the present, and let them draw their interest as they are now doing, retaining the principal as a trust fund.

Mr. TONGUE. Will the gentleman permit me to correct an impression that he seems to have? The Secretary of the Interior must determine the capability of these Indians. He thinks there are 306 who are competent to manage their own affairs. This act provides only that the money shall be paid to people who are capable of managing their own affairs.

Mr. RIDGELY. Under his judgment.

Mr. TONGUE. Under his judgment, and not to the children or the old people.

Mr. RIDGELY. His judgment may err.

Mr. TONGUE. Possibly; but it is hardly fair to assume that he will pay it to old and decrepit people or to young children. He will probably pay it to all heads of families and all over 21 years of age who are capable of intelligently using it. That is what the act authorizes him to do.

Mr. RIDGELY. If these people, as stated, can take care of themselves now, I think they will continue to take care of themselves if we retain this money on deposit for them, letting them draw the interest as at present. While I am opposed to all interest, yet we still have the interest system, and in this case it serves to provide for these wards and protect both them and ourselves against a possible greater burden.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Oregon.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support, civilization, and instruction of the Shoshones and Bannocks and other Indians of the Fort Hall Reservation, in Idaho, including pay of employees, $35,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I rise at this time to say that if I were present to-morrow I would favor certain legislation which is to be brought to the attention of the chairman in this bill; but inasmuch as I am called home by death in my family, I make this statement so as to avail myself of the opportunity that is to be given to members who addressed the committee to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. RIDGELY. I wish to ask a question of the chairman of the committee as to these items of miscellaneous support.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. RIDGELY. My question is as to these items for miscellaneous support. Is this all new legislation?

Mr. SHERMAN. None of it. It is identical, except the change in amount, with what we have appropriated from year to year.

Mr. RIDGELY. Simply as a general policy?

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, it is right along the same policy that we have pursued a great many years.

Mr. CURTIS. And where the change is made it is for a less amount.

Mr. RIDGELY. These items come out of the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is a gratuity, all of it.

Mr. RIDGELY. Is it annuities, out of trust funds?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is not annuities. All these items of miscellaneous support are absolute gratuities on the part of the Government.

Mr. RIDGELY. That is what I understood.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and civilization of the Yakimas and other Indians at said agency, including pay of employees, $5,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I think I will move that the committee do now rise, as it is nearly 5 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 7433 and had come to no resolution thereon.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—WISE VS. YOUNG.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Elections No. 3 to file the report of the committee in the contested-election case of Wise against Young, from the Second district of Virginia, and ask that a time may be fixed for the hearing before the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan submits a privileged report, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Report of Committee on Elections No. 3 in the case of Wise against Young.

The SPEAKER. The report will be printed, and the case will go on the House Calendar.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Michigan if he has made the request agreed on in the committee in reference to filing the views of the minority?

Mr. WEEKS. I was about to make that statement to the Chair. I would like to have the time fixed for the hearing, and what would the gentleman like——

Mr. BURKE of Texas. It was agreed in committee, Mr. Speaker, that the members of the minority should have ten days in which to present their views after the presentation of the report of the committee.

Mr. WEEKS. That would be satisfactory.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, ten days will be given to the minority in which to file their views. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Michigan that he can call the case up at any time.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HITT, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported the bill (H. R. 7941) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order upon that bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York reserves all points of order on the bill.

GUN TO CITY OF NASHVILLE, TENN.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2451) to present to the city of Nashville, State of Tennessee, the cannon on the gunboat Nashville from which was fired the first shot in the Spanish-American war.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and directed to condemn and detach from the gunboat Nashville the cannon from which was fired the first shot in the Spanish-American war and to deliver the same to the said city of Nashville, to be placed in some public place in that city, the title to the said cannon to be vested in the said city: Provided, That no expense shall be caused to the United States through delivery of said cannon.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to reserve the right to object until I can ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GAINES. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. Is that a modern gun?

Mr. GAINES. I think it is. I am not sure about it.

Mr. CANNON. Modern guns are quite expensive and wonderfully useful, and they are much needed. I would not object to giving to the city of Nashville some three or four old guns for monuments; but for a modern breech-loader and effective gun, I do not think we ought to start that.

Mr. GAINES. I will state, Mr. Speaker, that this bill has unanimously passed the Senate. The Committee on Naval Affairs have unanimously reported a bill of identically the same nature, and it is now pending before this body. In addition to that, Mr. Secretary Long has approved the passage of this bill; the Ordnance Department have approved it. The original cost of the gun was $410, and it has now served its day. Mr. Secretary Long has ordered it detached and sent home, because it is worn out, and has heartily indorsed the passage of this bill. The gun has served its day and can no longer be used.

Mr. CANNON. Has the gentleman a statement to that effect from the Secretary?

Mr. GAINES. Yes, sir; here is the report of the House committee. In addition to that, Mr. Secretary Long approved in the face of the bill—the very bill that the House committee has passed—a similar bill to this. Now, I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. CANNON. I would not object if this gun were worn out. I would be very glad for the city of Nashville to have it. But if it is a modern gun, and in good condition, why, I do not think we should permit it.

Mr. GAINES. It is a modern gun; but the gun is worn out. Here is a letter from the Navy Department which orders the commander of the vessel to detach it and to put another that is being sent there in its place. I will read that letter to you from the House report:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF ORDNANCE,
Washington, D. C., January 26, 1900.

SIR: 1. The Bureau requests that 1-pounder Hotchkiss R. F. gun, Mark II, register No. 121, 1-pounder hydraulic recoil mount, register No. 129, and 1-pounder cage stand, register No. 108, now on the U. S. S. Nashville, be sent to the United States (New York or San Francisco) by the first public conveyance.

2. Please replace this gun stand and mount by one now on hand. This gun was used in firing the first shot in the war with Spain, and has been donated by the Department to the city of Nashville, Tenn.

3. An extra 1-pounder, complete, will be sent you as soon as possible.

Respectfully,

CHARLES O'NEIL,
Chief of Bureau of Ordnance.

THE COMMANDER IN CHIEF,
United States Naval Force, Asiatic Station, Manila, P. I.

Mr. LACEY. Who signs that letter?

Mr. GAINES. That letter is signed by Charles O'Neil, Chief of Bureau of Ordnance, and it is addressed to the commander in chief of United States naval force, Asiatic Station, Manila, P. I.

Mr. LACEY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, as we have had so much controversy in the Navy about it. Is there any question as to which ship fired the first gun?

Mr. GAINES. That is settled by the commander of the Nashville and the record of the recent war, a correct copy of which I have taken from the records in Secretary Long's office, and made for me by his order.

Mr. LACEY. But what about the commander of some of the other ships?

Mr. GAINES. I do not know.

Mr. LACEY. There is no controversy?

Mr. GAINES. None whatever. Absolutely none.

Mr. CANNON. What about it being worn out; have you got anything further to show that?

Mr. GAINES. I have nothing more than this letter, and that ordered in my presence by Secretary Long to be written to the commander, Commodore Watson. As stated, it is to be detached from the ship and succeeded by a new gun. I should say that it is well worn, for it has been doing, I suppose, most of the firing ever since.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LOUD. Let me suggest to gentlemen you are establishing a precedent that is going to come home to trouble you. If this gun is absolutely worn out, the gentleman can get it in a formal bill requesting the donation of the gun to Nashville, and let the Secretary of the Navy determine what gun shall be sent there; and no doubt you can get this gun.

You are establishing a precedent here which will come from every city in the United States which has a battle ship or a gunboat named after it. There are ways of getting the gun without establishing such a precedent, if the gun is worn out and is obsolete, and I hope the gentleman will see it.

Mr. CANNON. I think if the gun is worn out, under the general legislation it can be given to the city.

Mr. GAINES. I will state to the gentleman that there are two precedents for this very thing. Yale College presented to the United States a gun for one of the ships that fought in the war with Spain. Harvard University presented one also. At the end of the war Congress passed resolutions giving back the respective guns to these colleges. Here is a cruiser named Nashville for the city of Nashville, that fired the first shot in the war, and the city of Nashville has passed an ordinance providing that this gun shall be held in trust for the benefit of the public, for future generations to admire, if donated to us. This bill is for nothing more than to give us title to the gun, that we may take care of it for future generations to look at and thereby inspire their patriotism.

Mr. LOUD. Let it go over, Mr. Speaker, until the gentleman can furnish the information.

Mr. GAINES. What information does the gentleman want?

Mr. LOUD. The letters.

Mr. GAINES. Here are the letters here.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I suggest to the gentleman from California that there can be no bad precedent in it, because this is given as the gun that fired the first shot in the war, and there can be no other first gun in the war.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It can not be made a precedent, Mr. Speaker, because the representation is here made that this gun is worn out.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that objection is made, unless withdrawn.

Mr. LOUD. Oh, I suppose I have got to withdraw, Mr. Speaker. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to make any objection, but I wish to correct a statement of the gentleman from Tennessee. The gun referred to as coming from Yale College was presented by the college to the Government, and at the close of the war it was given back in trust to the college to keep until the Government might need it again.

Mr. GAINES. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and it was read the third time.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will have the bill amended so that Congress will not attempt to say by legislative action which ship fired the first shot.

Mr. GAINES. That is a matter of record, as shown by this report and the official records in Mr. Secretary Long's office, which I read, and I have a copy of that record.

Mr. LOUD. I question that.

Mr. LACEY. The captain of the Nashville admits that he fired the first gun. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEELE. The same report says that this gun has already been given to Nashville.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It has simply been put there temporarily.

Mr. DALZELL. Does this bill propose to do anything more than that?

Mr. GAINES. No, sir.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to this bill, but I want this House to know, and I want the country to know, that the man who commanded the ship that fired that gun, and who ordered the gun to be fired, was Capt. Washburn Maynard, who was born and raised at, and sent to the Naval Academy from my city of Knoxville, Tenn. [Applause.]

The bill was then passed.

On motion of Mr. GAINES, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House bill lie on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, that will be done.

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO WITHDRAW PAPERS.

Leave was granted Mr. CLARKE of New Hampshire to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Ellen M. Burque, Fifty-fifth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

PACIFIC CABLE.

Mr. PERKINS. On behalf of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I present a statement of Gen. Wager Swayne, of New York, in regard to a Pacific cable, made before that committee January 30, 1900. I move that it be printed as a document.

The motion was agreed to.

THE NATIONAL WHITE CROSS.

Mr. STEWART. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2581) to incorporate the National White Cross of America, and for other purposes, to report it back and to ask that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. That committee has under consideration a bill for the purposes of the Red Cross Society, and on investigation it is ascertained that these bills compose the same fields of operation, and they have more or less relation with some forty treaties with foreign countries. Consequently, the Committee on the District of Columbia have come to the conclusion that it is proper that it should be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. ALLEN. Before that is done, I should like to make an inquiry. This bill was reported favorably in the last Congress from the Committee on the District of Columbia and it passed this body without a dissenting voice. It went over to the House. The committee there recommended favorably the passage of the bill, but this recommendation was not made until the day Congress adjourned, and the bill failed to pass the House. I wish to ask the Senator from Nevada if there is any contest on this bill?

Mr. STEWART. There is no contest whatever, but the operation proposed by the bill must take place in various countries. It is suggested that the treaties with those countries must be considered in connection with it. It is of the same scope of operation as the Red Cross Society, which has a bill pending before the Committee on Foreign Relations. The Committee on the District of Columbia, which reported the bill favorably last year, have no objection to the bill, but the idea is to have it considered by the Committee on Foreign Relations to see whether it will be an agreeable measure for this country and for other countries.

Mr. ALLEN. I shall object to the bill being sent to the Committee on Foreign Relations under the circumstances. It is altogether a domestic organization, and while it is to have operations in other countries, and has now, because it is doing charitable work in the Philippine Islands and that group, and has a great many representatives abroad in other countries, and has been fully established for several years as a voluntary association, yet its relation to other countries must be such as those countries themselves see fit to grant to the organization and can not result from any treaty rights.

Therefore, there is no reason for sending it to the Committee on Foreign Relations. It is purely an organization to be incorporated by Congress, and its own ramifications must be such as it may itself select, with the consent of foreign governments.

Now, there is another committee, the Committee on Corporations Organized in the District of Columbia, to which the bill properly belongs, I think; but it was sent to the Committee on the District of Columbia and reported here in the last Congress, and therefore I had it sent there at the present session.

Mr. STEWART. No member of the Committee on the District of Columbia has suggested any objection to the bill itself, but inasmuch as its operation is to be in foreign countries as much as in our own and may affect our treaties, of which there are about forty in number, with foreign countries in which it is to operate, it was thought proper that it should go to the Committee on Foreign Relations. There is no particular design about it except to have the proper thing done, and I presume this course will facilitate the consideration of the measure. I do not presume there will be any delay there, and there will be plenty of time before the end of the session to pass it.

Mr. ALLEN. There is nothing in the bill——

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will permit me, there is nothing in this bill to found any proper jurisdiction in the Committee on Foreign Relations. It does not affect foreign countries.

Mr. STEWART. The operation is to be in foreign countries.

Mr. ALLEN. It is impossible to say that a corporation organized in the United States can affect foreign countries. It can only reach foreign countries by the law of comity, by the consent of those foreign countries. It is impossible for the Red Cross Society or the White Cross Society or any other corporation to go into a foreign country and receive a status there without the consent of the country to which it applies. The seat of its organization must be the United States. That is the situs of the corporation.

Mr. STEWART. That is all true; but inasmuch as its operation is in foreign countries the District Committee thought it would be well for the Committee on Foreign Relations to consider it.

Mr. ALLEN. Then, I suppose, if a railroad company should make an arrangement with some water transporting company, and that company with some railroad company in England——

Mr. STEWART. Oh, no.

Mr. ALLEN. So that there would be a continuous line of water transportation in the United States and in England, we would have to send its proposed charter to the Committee on Foreign Relations because it affected that foreign country. Now, there is nothing in that argument.

Mr. President, this is my bill, and I move that it be referred to the Committee on Corporations Organized in the District of Columbia.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, there will be very serious objection urged to this bill. Such suggestions have been made to members of the committee. It seems to me important that it should go to the same committee that is considering bills in regard to the Red Cross, to be sure that there is no conflict and no interference with the purposes of that institution, which has done so much good in this and other countries.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska moves that the Committee on the District of Columbia be discharged from the further consideration of this bill, and that it be referred to the Committee on Corporations Organized in the District of Columbia. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HOAR. I thought the report of the committee recommended the reference of the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It did.

Mr. HOAR. Is there not a rule that on that question, which of course is in the nature of a motion to refer it to that committee, there can not be a motion to amend by referring it to another committee?

Mr. ALLEN. I can not hear the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts is clearly right. Unanimous consent was asked that the action be taken, but a motion made by the committee to be discharged from the consideration of a bill and that it be referred to another committee can not be amended by another motion. It can only be amended by adding instructions.

Mr. HOAR. My proposition is that by the rule (I have not looked to see, but it is my impression and my memory) a motion to refer a bill to one committee can not be amended by substituting another, but you must vote down the first motion if you want to get it to the other committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts is clearly right.

Mr. STEWART. My motion is to refer the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HOAR. That is the motion of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. STEWART. That is the report of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and my motion is to refer the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HOAR. So the question should be put on the motion of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. ALLEN. Do I understand that the motion to refer can not be amended?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can not be amended except by adding instructions.

Mr. ALLEN. There may be a rule of that kind. I am in ignorance of it if there is. I should like to be heard on the motion to refer. It is a debatable motion, I understand.

The remarks of the Senator from Vermont have disclosed exactly what is anticipated—that this return of the bill to the Senate and its proposed reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations is for the purpose of destroying it. It is an indirect way of throttling it and destroying this organization. If that is the purpose, and if the Senator——

Mr. PROCTOR. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator from Vermont is committed to that policy and proposes to use his powerful influence in this body to carry out that policy——

Mr. PROCTOR. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. ALLEN. I think it better to withdraw the bill entirely.

Mr. PROCTOR. This action is proposed for the purpose of referring the bill to the committee where it ought properly to be considered, and where it can be considered in connection with the Red Cross, which is well known. There is no purpose on the part of the committee to antagonize the bill in any way.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator said so. I took him at his word.

Mr. PROCTOR. It came to the knowledge of some members of the committee that probably it would be antagonized, or at least that the purpose would be carefully investigated to see whether it did any harm to the existing Red Cross.

Mr. ALLEN. That is it. Mr. President, there is nothing in this bill, there is nothing in the names of the persons who are proposed as incorporators, to suggest even a suspicion that there is anything wrong in the purpose of the organization. It is purely a charitable organization, and the persons connected with it are disinterestedly engaged in public charity and have been for years. In view of the fact that the bill in the last Congress was recommended by the Committee on the District of Columbia, that it passed the Senate and had a favorable recommendation in the House, and would have passed there but for the adjournment of Congress, what has taken place to induce the Committee on the District of Columbia to return it in this form and undertake to throttle it by this indirect means?

Of course I understand, Mr. President, quite well. I am old enough to understand and I have had experience enough to understand that when gentlemen do not want to be responsible for directly throttling a measure of this kind they always seek out some indirect channel to get rid of responsibility. That indirect channel to get rid of responsibility in this case is to send it to a committee where it has no proper lodgment—for it is as foreign to the duties of the Committee on Foreign Relations as would be the organization of a domestic corporation in my State—and there permit it to rest until the session of Congress adjourns.

Mr. STEWART. I will state for the information of the Senator from Nebraska that the Red Cross Society is incorporated under the general law of the District of Columbia as a corporation, and they have a bill now pending before the Committee on Foreign Relations. It is a bill for some special privileges. It seems to me that as these matters are purely benevolent and praiseworthy all around, there should be no conflict and that the thing should go along harmoniously. I think the Committee on Foreign Relations, having the whole subject before them, will see that it is carried out in a way entirely just to all concerned and to the encouragement of all the parties who feel called upon to forward the benevolent and praiseworthy work. I believe the bill had better be sent there.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the duty of the Chair to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate for the consideration to-day of the motion of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART]. Is there objection to the present consideration of the motion?

Mr. ALLEN. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It goes over, then, under the rule.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. CULLOM. I am inclined to think that that bill ought to go to the Committee on Commerce instead, as it is a bill providing for the construction of a canal, and so forth. The Committee on Interstate Commerce has not dealt with that subject much.

A bill (S. 2921) granting a pension to Archibald Jasper Powell.

Mr. McCOMAS introduced a bill (S. 2922) for the relief of Rinaldo P. Smith; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2923) for the relief of the estate of Elijah Thompson, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORT ON AFFAIRS IN THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on the Philippines, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the information of the Congress a report of a commission appointed by me on January 20, 1899, to investigate affairs in the Philippine Islands.

WILLIAM McKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 2, 1900.

AMENDMENT TO APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DAVIS submitted an amendment providing for the appointment of a court crier of the United States circuit and district court for the district of Minnesota, intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

AFFAIRS AT OSAGE INDIAN AGENCY.

Mr. HARRIS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish to the Senate the reports made to his Department by United States Indian Inspector James McLaughlin and Inspector James W. Zevely and others regarding the management of affairs at the Osage Indian Agency, Okla., by the United States Indian agent and others, including all affidavits, petitions, and protests filed by the Osage tribe of Indians, or by others on their behalf, together with charges and other papers affecting the management of the said Indian agency since January 1, 1898.

TRANSACTIONS BETWEEN TREASURY DEPARTMENT AND BANKS.

Mr. ALLEN. I submit a resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That a special committee, consisting of nine members of the Senate, be immediately appointed by the President pro tempore to make a thorough and complete investigation of all dealings and transactions between the Secretary of the Treasury or the Treasury Department of the United States and the National City Bank and the Hanover National Bank, of the city of New York, or any other national bank of the United States, from the 4th day of March, 1897, to the present time, and especially in regard to all letters, agreements, papers, or documents between the Treasury Department of the United States, or any person connected therewith, and the National City Bank and the Hanover National Bank, of the city of New York, or any person acting for them, or either of them, since the 4th day of March, 1897, relating to the depositing of public funds, bonds, or revenues in said bank or banks, or any other relations or business transactions now existing or heretofore had between the Government and the said banks, or either of them, and the amount of public money, bonds, or revenue deposited with said banks, or either of them, or with any national bank, by the Government, upon what security, for what length of time, and the reasons therefor, and whether said banks, or any of them, have paid the Government any interest on said deposits, and if so, how much, and all other information concerning the same or in any way relating thereto; and also the date of the sale of the custom-house property of the United States in New York City to said National City Bank, the date of the execution of the deed thereto, the date and manner of payment of the purchase money therefor, the disposition of the proceeds of said sale, and whether or not the Government has paid any rents for said property, or any portion thereof, for any purpose since the day of sale, and if so, to whom, and all facts relating to said transaction, and all other matters in connection therewith or in any way relating thereto; and said committee is authorized to send for persons, books, letters, telegrams, papers, documents, and agreements, administer oaths, and hold open sessions, and sit at any time in any place in the city of Washington, New York, or Chicago, the expense for the same to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and the Sergeant-at-Arms, or some one acting for him, shall attend said committee and carry out its mandates; and said committee is instructed to make a report to the Senate, with testimony and exhibits, with all convenient speed.

Mr. ALDRICH. Let the resolution be printed and go over.

Mr. ALLEN. I hope the country will note that the objection to this resolution comes from the Republican side and not from this side.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go over under the rule.

COMPILATION OF ORGANIC ACTS FOR THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. FORAKER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pacific Islands and Puerto Rico is hereby authorized to have compiled for the use of the committee the organic acts for the Territories of the United States.

PROCEEDS UNDER ABANDONED PROPERTY ACT.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish to the Senate a statement showing the amount of money remaining in the Treasury of the United States from the sale of property collected under "An act to provide for the collection of abandoned property and the prevention of fraud in insurrectionary districts within the United States," approved March 12, 1863; and to state the names of officers or agents making such deposits, the amount of each deposit and date of the same, and name of the person reported to have been the owner in each case.

PROCEEDINGS OF NAVAL COURTS-MARTIAL.

Mr. ALLEN. With the unanimous consent of the Senate, I should like to conclude the remarks that I began yesterday on the resolution relative to transactions with the National City Bank and the Hanover National Bank of the city of New York.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is not completed. Is there further morning business? The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. PETTUS, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy is directed to inform the Senate whether the Navy Department has or has not refused or refrained to communicate to the Court of Claims any information concerning proceedings of naval courts-martial on the call of said court, under section 1076 of the Revised Statutes; and if so, his reasons for such refusal or neglect.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Senator from Alabama to consent to let this resolution go over without losing its place on the Calendar until the next legislative day.

Mr. HOAR. I thought it was amended by consent of the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. It was, by putting in the word "refrained."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire has the floor.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that the resolution may be allowed to go over another day without losing its place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire simply whether the amendment which was suggested yesterday and accepted by the Senator from Alabama has not been made.

Mr. PETTUS. I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. HOAR. I inquire whether, in the resolution which was just read, the amendment has not been made which I understood was accepted by the Senator from Alabama, to strike out the word "neglected."

Mr. PETTUS. It was so amended.

Mr. HOAR. It has not been so read. It was read as originally presented.

Mr. CHANDLER. Unfortunately, the Senator from Massachusetts did not carry out his idea in full. The words "refusal or neglect" also occur at the end of the resolution. That change has not been made.

Mr. HOAR. That change should not be made.

Mr. CHANDLER. But as the resolution goes over, it can be modified.

Mr. HOAR. I will call the attention of the Senator from Alabama to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go over until to-morrow, without objection, retaining its place on the Calendar. If there be no further morning business the Calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

THE PHILIPPINE COMMISSION.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I think there is a resolution which I introduced yesterday, which I ask to have considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is on the table subject to the Senator's call.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I did not so understand it. I asked to have it go over until to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota presented yesterday a resolution and asked that it lie on the table. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. PETTIGREW, as follows:

Resolved, That the paper entitled "The Philippine Commission" be printed as a document for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless the Senate otherwise orders, the resolution goes to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask that the resolution be adopted.

Mr. LODGE. I think a document about which we know nothing had better take the regular course and go to the Committee on Printing. I see no reason to change the usual course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution now.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I desire to address the Senate on that subject.

Mr. CHANDLER. Is that motion debatable, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is inclined to think that it is. The Chair does not know of any rule of the Senate to the contrary.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, the document which I desire to have printed is a brief one, and is signed by William Birney, J. B. Henderson, J. S. Fowler, Charles H. Turner, Charles James, Patrick O'Farrell, Franklin H. Mackey, P. T. Moran, Rossa Downing, Henry Spofford, Louis Schade, and W. A. Croffut, a committee of the Anti-Imperialist League of Washington, D. C. It is a comment upon the report of the commission sent to the Philippines, which they made just before the election last fall. This paper is dated November 18, 1899. It contains no matter, I think, which could be objected to on account of its form or on account of the composition; and I very much hope the Senator from Massachusetts will allow it to be printed as a document without——

Mr. HAWLEY. I think it has already appeared in the press.

Mr. LODGE. The question is not whether it should be allowed or not. We have a rule regulating the matter of printing. We have a Committee on Printing, to whom such matters are referred, as all matters relating to legislation of any sort are referred to the appropriate committees. I can not see why the numerous documents which are offered to be printed should not go through the regular form of a reference to that committee for their report.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, the custom of printing documents for the information of the Senate is an old one. It has been indulged in constantly for the ten years I have been a member of this body, at every session, and for many years before that time. Although I have not looked up the historic fact, I am informed by the oldest members of the Senate that it has been in vogue since they have been here.

I presume the practice of asking for the printing of documents has been indulged in more frequently during the last few years than before, and I think it has been prompted somewhat by the fact that the great journals of the country are not open for the publication of many things which interest at least half of the voters of the United States. They will not report what transpires here. They will not publish in their columns anything that would interfere with the interests which they serve. The result is that very many questions in which the people whom I represent are interested and in which many other people are interested throughout this country can only reach them through this source.

Therefore we have asked, and I have asked many times, for the printing of documents with regard to the question of finance, with regard to the problems in relation to labor, with regard to the Government ownership of corporations which are so situated that their service is a monopoly. It is information in almost every instance that would not be given to the public through the great journals of the day, for the interest and influence which control the Republican party, the great corporations of the country, control the great newspapers of the country. They are anonymous sheets. No one but the corporation that controls them is responsible for their utterances. Their editorials are written by hired men who have a salary and who write that which they are paid to write, without any reference to their personal opinions or convictions on the subject. This has become so notorious that it is well understood by every laboring man and every farmer in America. Therefore we have sought this means of getting before the public these questions which interest our people.

It is well known that nearly all the great journals of the country are in favor of the policy of the Administration. In my opinion fully half of the voters of this country are opposed to that policy. They are unable to present their views and their opinions through the great newspapers; and therefore we have asked that documents upon this subject, written by able men of character and standing, should be printed by the Senate, in order that we may distribute them through the mails under the franking privilege.

The document which I propose this morning to have printed is a communication addressed to the Washington Post, dated November 18, 1899.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state his question of order.

Mr. GALLINGER. I make the point of order that under the rules of the Senate it is not in order at any time before 2 o'clock for a Senator to debate a motion to take up anything for consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. PETTIGREW. That is, that no debate can be had except by unanimous consent?

Mr. GALLINGER. And I do not give unanimous consent.

Mr. TELLER. Why, Mr. President, there are some questions that certainly can be debated. I do not say that this can.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The Chair just ruled that this could be debated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will have the rule read. The Secretary will read the last clause of Rule VIII.

The Secretary read as follows:

> All motions made before 2 o'clock to proceed to the consideration of any matter shall be determined without debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. "All motions."

Mr. TELLER. "All motions" to do a certain thing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. "To proceed to the consideration of."

Mr. TELLER. Yes; but there are other things that may be done. I understood the Chair to rule that no debate could take place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair simply ruled that debate on this question was out of order if objected to.

Mr. ALLEN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. ALLEN. Could not the Senator from South Dakota, or any other Senator, move to refer this measure to a committee, and debate that motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; because it is not before the Senate for consideration.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is not before the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN. That precise question was passed upon by Vice-President Stevenson in the Fifty-third Congress; it was elaborately debated by my former colleague, General Manderson; and after that debate it was so ruled.

Mr. HOAR. But the matter must have been up so that the motion could be in order.

Mr. ALLEN. It was a question on a motion like this. It was an ordinary motion or resolution that came before the Senate. The same point was made which the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] now makes. My former colleague had the floor, and, as I understood, he moved to refer it to some committee. Then the question came up whether that motion was debatable, and, after a discussion, it was held to be debatable.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I was only making a motion, and I understood the Chair to rule that it was debatable. I understood by that that it was debatable now, and therefore I proceeded to debate it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator was proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I did not ask unanimous consent. I simply asked if it was debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule is entirely different where the matter under discussion relates to the printing of a document. That differs from an ordinary resolution which is placed on the table and goes over under an objection, which, under a former ruling, has its day in court. The rule in relation to the printing of a document is that the resolution or motion to print must go to the Committee on Printing, unless the Senate otherwise order. The Chair knows of no way in which the Senate can otherwise order unless the matter is under consideration. The Senator's motion to proceed to consider was right, undoubtedly.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to debate it now upon the motion to consider.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Chair kindly state what is the pending question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution which has been read to the Senate.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That motion, as I understand, must be decided without debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion must be decided without debate.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution offered by the Senator from South Dakota, which is for the printing of a document.

Mr. HOAR. What was the parliamentary condition of that resolution before the motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was by unanimous consent ordered to lie on the table, subject to the call of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. HOAR. That order was made yesterday——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was made yesterday.

Mr. HOAR. When it came up in its order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It came up in its order under the head of resolutions. The resolution was presented yesterday.

Mr. HOAR. What is the effect, then, of the unanimous consent of the Senate that a matter lie on the table subject to the call of the Senator from South Dakota? Is he not entitled to call it up in the morning hour?

Mr. GALLINGER. I would suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that undoubtedly the Senator from South Dakota is entitled to call it up, and he did so, but action must be taken without debate when it is called up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would hold that the resolution on the table by consent comes up to-day at the request of the Senator; but there it meets another rule of the Senate, which is, that it must be referred to the Committee on Printing, unless the Senate otherwise order.

The Chair was mistaken about the Senator from South Dakota asking that the resolution lie on the table subject to his call. It is simply on the table, and the Chair assumed that it was subject to the Senator's call.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Chair have the Secretary read exactly what did occur?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 1, 1900, as follows:

> THE PHILIPPINE COMMISSION.
> Mr. PETTIGREW. I submit a resolution, and ask to have it read and lie on the table. To-morrow morning I shall wish to speak to the resolution.
> The resolution was read, as follows:
>
> "Resolved, That a paper entitled 'The Philippine Commission' be printed as a document for the information of the Senate."
> The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota asks that the resolution lie on the table. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. It is so ordered.

Mr. TELLER. It seems to me that, according to the usage and custom of the Senate, the Senate had given permission to the Senator from South Dakota to speak on the resolution to-day. That is the way it looks to me. He announced his desire to have the resolution lie on the table for the purpose of speaking upon it, and to that there was universal assent; otherwise the resolution would not have any rights, and would go to the Committee on Printing or elsewhere.

Mr. HOAR. It would have gone over one day.

Mr. TELLER. It would have gone over one day, and then to-day it would come up. It seems to me that the Senate granted permission to the Senator from South Dakota to speak on that resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is compelled to hold otherwise.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I do not care to object to the ruling of the Chair, but it seems to me that it is a departure from the custom and practice of the Senate. I simply want to call attention to the fact that it is a departure from the practice and custom of the Senate; and inasmuch as we are making so many departures from everything that our country has ever done heretofore and from every principle of government that we have ever indorsed, and inasmuch as no longer are the mails of the United States safe, but are opened and rifled by the Government; and inasmuch as——

Mr. GALLINGER. I object to further debate, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire objects to debate.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I rise to enter my solemn protest against the decision of the Chair in this case; and I shall be greatly obliged if the clerks of the Senate will make a thorough search to find a precedent to sustain it. I know the Chair aims to do what is right, but I do not believe that this decision is in accordance with the universal rules and customs of this body.

Mr. HOAR. May I be allowed to say one word?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I sympathize, as I suppose everybody knows, with the desire of the honorable Senator from South Dakota to have the fullest information get to the people about this great subject, in which he takes so deep an interest, and I think that in some quarters there has been a tendency to withhold information from the people; but I am bound to say, in justice to the Chair and to the Senate, that I do not see how the Chair could have ruled otherwise on this particular occasion.

The Senator presented his resolution yesterday. If it had gone over as an ordinary resolution, it would have come up to-day, and he would have been entitled, under the usage of the Senate, to be recognized and then to speak in his right. I am not now speaking of anything connected with the printing, but I am speaking generally as to resolutions. Instead of doing that, the Senator consented that the resolution should go to the table; and that is all that appears in the RECORD, which has been read, that it lie on the table, with no reservation of a right on the part of the Senator to call it up at his pleasure.

Mr. TELLER. Oh, yes.

Mr. HOAR. I do not so understand.

Mr. TELLER. Then the Senator does not know the fact.

Mr. HOAR. Let us see.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let me read what occurred.

Mr. HOAR. Very well; read it.

Mr. COCKRELL. This is what occurred as shown by the RECORD:

> Mr. PETTIGREW. I submit a resolution, and ask to have it read and lie on the table. To-morrow morning I shall wish to speak to the resolution.
> The resolution was read, as follows:
>
> "Resolved, That a paper entitled 'The Philippine Commission' be printed as a document for the information of the Senate."
> The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota asks that the resolution lie on the table. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. It is so ordered.

Mr. HOAR. That is all. The request from the Chair, therefore, is all that the Senate can take notice of as a matter of order, and that is simply that the resolution lie on the table. To that no objection was made.

This is, in substance, in form, in every way, it seems to me, an ordinary motion to take a subject from the table; and a motion to take a subject from the table—to say nothing about the general parliamentary law—is, like a motion to lay on the table, undebatable. There is an express rule of the Senate that a motion to proceed to the consideration of a matter in the morning hour, before 2 o'clock, is not debatable. Under those circumstances, saying nothing about the point that this is a resolution for printing, which is governed by another rule—I do not say anything about that—it seems to me, while all my sympathies are with the Senator from South Dakota, that the Senate is bound, when such a solemn protest is made as that made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], to do justice to the Chair. I think the Chair has ruled exactly right.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not.

Mr. HOAR. In other words, it makes no difference what was said before the order of the Senate was made as to the desire or expectation or hope of the Senator from South Dakota. We are bound by what the Chair submitted to the Senate and by what the Senate agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. And the Senate agreed that the Senator from South Dakota might speak.

Mr. HOAR. Oh, no.

Mr. TELLER. The giving of that notice by the Senator from South Dakota, which was not objected to, was as clear an agreement as was ever made on the floor of this body.

Mr. HOAR. I know it is a technical point. There are other ways in which the honorable Senator from South Dakota can get what he desires and can not be prevented, and I do not suppose he will be.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I challenge anyone to show me a precedent in the case of a Senator introducing a resolution and asking that it lie on the table and saying that to-morrow morning he would address the Senate on that question where the Senate has refused him that privilege.

Mr. HOAR. That is a courtesy, not a parliamentary right. The Chair can not expound the rules of courtesy.

Mr. COCKRELL. It has been construed as a right. There has never been any requirement that the Chair should announce that fact and state that it had been agreed to by the Senate. This is the first time—and I challenge any Senator to show the contrary—where this custom and rule has been departed from.

Mr. TELLER. I do not want to continue a discussion on a matter that has been settled, but it seems to me that the Senate, as well as it could, has made an order that the request of the Senator from South Dakota should be granted. His request was not that the resolution should lie on the table, but that the resolution should lie upon the table and that he should be allowed to speak upon it.

Mr. PETTIGREW. This is the fact.

Mr. TELLER. And the Chair submitted that whole question, if he submitted anything at all. The Chair did not say that the resolution would lie on the table, but the Chair inquired whether there was objection to the request of the Senator from South Dakota.

I agree with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] that there never has been a case of this kind when a Senator has announced himself as anxious to speak on a resolution under such circumstances where there has ever been a denial of it. There certainly never has been since I have been a member of the Senate, and I do not believe such a precedent can be found. Of course such a request may possibly be denied, but it is a courtesy due to the Senator from South Dakota, and there is no reason why there should be any obstacle interposed.

I am not in sympathy with the resolution of the Senator, as I said yesterday or the day before, but I am in sympathy with maintaining the traditions of the Senate and I am in favor of full and fair debate.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. TELLER. Yes.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator from Colorado understand when a Senator gives notice that he will call up a subject on the table on a future day, whether the next day or the next week or at any other time, it is always granted? If the request is granted is it not by courtesy of the Senate and not by parliamentary right?

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I rise to make an inquiry——

Mr. HOAR. I agree with the Senator from Colorado that such a request has never been denied, and that it ought not to be denied now; but I am speaking of the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. TELLER. Where the Chair submits the question to the Senate I say it is more than a courtesy, it is the right of a Senator. If I rise and say, "To-morrow I shall address the Senate on a certain proposition" or that "I will call up a certain measure," and the Chair says nothing, that request is understood to be granted. There is no analogy between the two cases. Here the Senate made an order——

Mr. HOAR. What was the order?

Mr. TELLER. The order was that the resolution should lie on the table, and that the Senator from South Dakota should have the privilege of speaking upon it.

Mr. HOAR. Oh, no.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] a while ago objected to debate, and the Chair ruled that debate was out of order.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow me to make a request on this subject?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. It seems to me it is rather confusing to discuss these parliamentary questions; and, under the circumstances, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from South Dakota may be permitted to proceed in order.

Mr. ALLEN. I hope the Senator from South Dakota will not avail himself of that privilege.

Mr. CHANDLER. We have got to hear one or the other, either the Senator from South Dakota or the Senator from Nebraska; and I think the Senator from Nebraska ought not to object to allowing the Senator from South Dakota to go on. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I regret that I did not hear what the Senator from New Hampshire said. He is always saying witty things at my expense, which I fully appreciate; but I do not think, if I may be indulged a moment, that the Senator from South Dakota—of course he is his own master and can do as he sees fit—but I do not think——

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLEN. I do not want to be interrupted.

Mr. CHANDLER. I want to apologize to the Senator.

Mr. ALLEN. No; you owe me no apology. You could not offend me if you sought to.

I do not think the Senator from South Dakota ought to accept a gratuity at the hands of the majority in this Chamber, for it is a gratuity, and grudgingly given. Yesterday the Senator who made objection here a moment ago asked leave of the Senate to publish a document—I mean the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]—and it was given. To-day some other Senator on this side asked leave to publish a document which was as vulnerable to this rule as the document offered by the Senator from South Dakota. Leave was given. The only ground of objection to the publication of this document is that it hurts you a little, and you do not like it. You do not want the people to know the truth.

Mr. ALDRICH. To what document does the Senator from Nebraska allude?

Mr. ALLEN. I am referring to the document the Senator from South Dakota has been trying for almost a week to get before the Senate.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator said just a moment ago that the Senate had to-day consented to the publication of a document.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] asked for the publication of some paper as a document.

Mr. ALDRICH. That was for a compilation of the laws of the United States, and it was reported from a committee.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] did not have a compilation of the laws of the United States printed. What he asked was for the printing of some private publication.

Mr. FORAKER. I did not so understand. What I understood the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] to ask permission to have published was the testimony taken before his committee in regard to the laying of cables in the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. ALLEN. No; that is not the one to which I refer.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator asked that it might be published for the use of the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN. That is not the one at all.

Mr. FORAKER. That was what I called attention to.

Mr. PERKINS. That was from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. ALLEN. I am not referring to that at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I did ask yesterday for the publication of a very brief document which shed light on pension matters, which I thought would be of interest to the Committee on Pensions and to the Senate. Of course it was competent for any Senator to object to the printing of that document if he had chosen to do so, but no objection was interposed, and the order was made that the document should be printed.

Mr. ALLEN. And no objection ought to be made.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Nebraska permit me to ask that the entry in the Journal as to what happened yesterday may be read?

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, am I not entitled to have my request for unanimous consent submitted to the Senate, according to the rules and usages of the Senate?

Mr. ALLEN. I do not see how the Senator from New Hampshire got the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator object?

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not think a request for unanimous consent has ever been destroyed by a speech. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLEN. I do not understand how the Senator from New Hampshire can get the floor and make a request while I myself have the floor.

Mr. CHANDLER. I made the request before the Senator took the floor.

Mr. ALLEN. I beg your pardon.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator took the floor to object to unanimous consent.

Mr. ALLEN. I had the floor and was recognized before the Senator from New Hampshire rose.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] yielded to me.

Mr. ALLEN. Oh, no.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Nebraska is on the floor all the time.

Mr. ALLEN. I will withdraw——

Mr. WOLCOTT. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado will state his point of order.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I understand this discussion is proceeding by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. WOLCOTT. In the furtherance of the public business, I desire to object to further discussion.

Mr. ALDRICH. Regular order.

Mr. ALLEN. That, of course, is the proper way to cut out all debate, and that is in accordance with the course of procedure here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. CHANDLER. Now I renew my request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar under Rule VIII is in order. The first bill on the Calendar will be stated.

C. R. DOBBINS.

The bill (S. 746) to authorize C. R. Dobbins to accept a gold watch awarded to him by the government of the Dominion of Canada in recognition of his humane and gallant services to the shipwrecked crew of the British schooner Ashton, of Weymouth, Nova Scotia, was announced as first in order on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none, and the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I think this important measure needs some debate before the question is put on its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska is recognized.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska will allow the Chair to suggest that, under Rule VIII, only five minutes are allowed for debate to any one Senator.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well, Mr. President, five minutes is not of very much value to me, and I will surrender it to the Senate. [Laughter.]

The bill was reported to the Senate without amentment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

SALARY OF POSTMASTER AT WASHINGTON, D. C.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I rise to morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, morning business will be received.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am instructed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6272) fixing the salary of the postmaster at Washington City, D. C., to report it favorably without amendment. It is a bill which consists of but a few lines, increasing the salary of the postmaster of Washington City to $6,000 a year. I ask that the bill which was passed by the House shall be substituted for a similar bill reported from the Senate Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

I beg to say to the Senate that under the rules and regulations of the Post-Office Department the business at the Washington post-office justifies the payment of $6,000 a year salary to the postmaster in this city; but under an arbitrary law some years since enacted it was provided that the postmaster at Washington should receive a salary of $5,000. This puts him only on the footing of other postmasters of the country whose business warrants such a salary. There is no such overworked and overburdened official in the United States, under the Post-Office Department, as the postmaster at Washington, and I ask that this bill, which consists of but four or five lines and has come from the House of Representatives, may be acted upon by the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN. I object to it.

Mr. TELLER. I ask my colleague if the salary provided in the bill is based on the business of the office?

Mr. WOLCOTT. It is based entirely on the business of the office. There is a larger business done in the Washington post-office than in any other office except that at New York.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado reports a bill from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 6272) fixing the salary of the postmaster at Washington City, D. C.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado asks that this bill be substituted for Senate bill 1807, on the same subject.

Mr. COCKRELL. No, Mr. President; I hope the Senator from Colorado will not ask for that, but will merely ask for the passage of the House bill.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am asking for the substitution of the House bill for the Senate bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. But you do not want to substitute the House bill for the Senate bill. If you do that it becomes a Senate bill and would have to go back to the House of Representatives for its action.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The Senator from Missouri is correct. That is the proper formula, and I am obliged to the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the Senator from Colorado asks for the consideration of the House bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. That is correct. That is what I intended to ask.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. ALLEN. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska objects.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I hope the Senator will not object.

Mr. ALLEN. We are even now.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Oh, well, but we are more than even. I would far rather be under obligations to the Senator from Nebraska than have him under obligations to me. I hope the Senator will yield.

Mr. ALLEN. There will be no obligation.

Mr. WOLCOTT. If it was a matter that affected me personally I should be very glad to have the Senator object, but I have no desire in the world in making the request I have except to relieve this overburdened officer.

Mr. ALLEN. I only desire to establish Senatorial parity and courtesy, and I insist on my objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I hope the Senator from Nebraska will withdraw his objection.

Mr. ALLEN. You can vote it over.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I do not wish to vote it over. I do not wish to do anything to which the Senator from Nebraska objects.

Mr. ALLEN. Well, I will be more generous than was the Senator from Colorado, and I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am very much obliged to the Senator.

Mr. ALLEN. And he can have the right of way to the floor all day if he desires it.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I do not. I had far rather sit and listen to the Senator from Nebraska.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6272) fixing the salary of the postmaster at Washington City, D. C. It proposes to repeal so much of section 4 of the act entitled "An act to adjust the salaries of postmasters," approved March 3, 1883, as fixes the salary of the postmaster at Washington City, D. C., and provides that the salary shall hereafter be adjusted, as provided in the cases of other postmasters, under section 1 of that act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the Senate bill on the same subject be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection, the bill (S. 1807) fixing the salary of the postmaster at Washington, D. C., will be indefinitely postponed.

CHARLES T. RADER.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the Calendar be proceeded with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next bill in order on the Calendar will be stated.

The bill (S. 707) for the relief of Charles T. Rader was announced as next in order, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. COCKRELL. In line 7, after the word "unappropriated," I move to insert "nonmineral;" and after the words "public lands," in the same line, to insert "subject to entry under the desert-land laws." That is evidently the purpose of the bill, and not to give permission to enter any and every kind of land.

Mr. CARTER. There is no objection to the amendment. I think the word "nonmineral" should come after the word "unappropriated" instead of before.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is where it is to be inserted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 7, after the word "unappropriated," it is proposed to insert "nonmineral;" and after the words "public lands," in the same line, to insert "subject to entry under the desert-land laws."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to have the bill read at length. I did not hear it fully when it was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill as it has been amended will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Charles T. Rader, of Fort Logan, Mont., be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered to select by legal subdivisions, at such place or places as he may desire in the State of Montana, 480 acres of unoccupied and unappropriated nonmineral public lands, subject to entry under the desert-land laws, and when such selection shall be by him certified to the Secretary of the Interior patent shall be issued to said Rader for the same.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The Committee on Public Lands reported an amendment to strike out the preamble; which was agreed to.

ABANDONED PROPERTY.

The bill (S. 602) to revive and amend an act to provide for the collection of abandoned property and the prevention of frauds in insurrectionary districts within the United States, and acts amendatory thereof, was announced as the next case in order on the Calendar.

Mr. ALDRICH. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will go over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES OF NAPOLEON B. GIDDINGS.

The bill (S. 421) for the relief of Napoleon B. Giddings was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of War to cause to be investigated the circumstances of the alleged taking from Napoleon B. Giddings, in January, 1847, at Santa Fe, N. Mex., and deposit with A. B. Dyer, lieutenant of ordnance, United States Army, by order of Sterling Price, colonel commanding the army in New Mexico at that time, of 140 kegs of gunpowder, and if the same, or any part thereof, was never returned to Giddings, then the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to cause to be paid to the legal representatives of Giddings the reasonable market value of such powder.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Napoleon B. Giddings."

GEORGE A. ORR.

The bill (S. 422) for the relief of George A. Orr was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay George A. Orr, as acting assistant provost-marshal at Mount Vernon, Mo., from May 28, 1863, to January 30, 1864, at the rate of $100 per month for his services, and such sum for legitimate expenses during that period as may be shown and found to have been actually expended by him in the lawful discharge of his duties and necessary for the public service.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TRANSACTIONS WITH NEW YORK CITY BANKS.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, yesterday the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] commenced a speech upon the resolution which was then pending before the Senate in regard to discharging the Committee on Finance from the consideration of certain Senate resolutions. He was not able to finish his speech yesterday, and the resolution went to the Calendar. I ask now that the resolution may be taken up out of order to enable the Senator from Nebraska to finish his speech.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution submitted by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. ALLEN on the 31st ultimo, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and they are hereby, discharged from the further consideration of Senate resolutions of inquiry dated January 4 and 23, 1900, concerning certain transactions between the Treasury Department of the United States and the National City Bank and the Hanover National Bank, of the city of New York.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Rhode Island? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Nebraska is recognized.

Mr. ALLEN addressed the Senate in continuation of the speech begun by him yesterday. After having spoken for thirty-five minutes,

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLAY in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the unfinished business may be laid aside informally so as to allow the Senator from Nebraska to finish his remarks.

Mr. ALLEN. When the hour of 2 o'clock arrives, the Senator from Nebraska departs, thank you.

Mr. ALDRICH. I would be very glad to have the unfinished business laid aside if the Senator wants to conclude.

Mr. ALLEN. No.

Mr. President, yesterday my remarks were cut short by the speech of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], who had given previous notice of his intention to address the Senate at a given hour, and this morning I find that the political kaleidoscope has been making so many rapid revolutions in so many different directions that I do not know whether I can collect myself sufficiently to resume the thread of my discussion where I left it yesterday.

I hurriedly finished a very hurried review of Senate Document No. 70 of this Congress, and was about to proceed to review Senate Document No. 121, which is the reply of the Secretary of the Treasury sent to the Senate a few days ago in response to its resolution. I had not reached that portion of my discussion where I desired to direct attention to the unexplained and inexplicable conduct, as I think, of the Secretary of the Treasury in connection with the sale of the old custom-house in the city of New York. Without referring to dates, because dates are not at all material in the discussion, it is sufficient to say that the last Congress authorized the sale of the old custom-house in New York for not less than $3,000,000, and that the Secretary of the Treasury, pursuant to that authority, sold the custom-house to the National City Bank of New York for about three and a half million dollars.

Any ordinary business transaction would have been characterized either by the payment of the consideration to the grantor or its securement in some proper businesslike form, but that was not done in this instance. It was currently reported in the press at the time, and it has never been denied, so far as I know, that Mr. Stillman, president of the National City Bank, came to this city with a check for over $3,000,000, whatever the amount of the purchase money was, and for some reason unknown to the country, and unknown to me, he returned to New York, and not a dollar of that money was ever covered into the Treasury or any subtreasury of the United States. A book account was opened with the Government, and the Government was credited on the books of the bank, as I am informed, with that sum of money, which simply made the bank the debtor of the United States the same as it would be the debtor of an ordinary depositor or person to whom credit had been given.

Mr. President, $50,000 of the purchase money was retained in this peculiar way, that the check or draft did not cover $50,000. That was retained and the transaction left incomplete. The deed was placed in escrow, and is there yet, I guess, and it was presumably put there and is kept there for the purpose of enabling the National City Bank of the City of New York to escape payment of about $60,000 of taxes annually, which they have escaped, I understand, up to this time. The Secretary of the Treasury, without ever having received a dollar or a farthing for this property, has rented the building from the National City Bank for at least five years, at a rental of $130,600 a year, and we have before us now a recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury to amend the urgent deficiency bill to include the first year's rent. It did not make its appearance, however, I noticed, when the bill was before the Senate and when it was passed.

There may be gentlemen who will say that this is a business transaction; that there is nothing questionable about it. Mr. President, there is not a business man in the United States who, if he carried on his own private business in as loose and slipshod a manner as this business was transacted, would not be a bankrupt within twenty-four months from the time he began. Unfortunately for the public virtue of our country, there has grown up the theory, and with it the practice, that there is not required the same high degree of business ability, business application, or business integrity in handling the affairs of the State or nation that is demanded in private enterprises.

Men are heard to say when you speak of these things, "Oh, that is Government business; that is handling the Government's funds," as though the Government property and the Government business ought to be transacted with less regard to business principles and less regard to integrity than the most sacred private enterprise. I wish to take this occasion, Mr. President, to enter my solemn dissent from a conclusion of that kind.

In this last document, which contains the reply of the Secretary of the Treasury, there is no unequivocal denial of the allegations of the resolution. The Secretary of the Treasury simply says there is not to be found on record such and such things, and that he does not recollect certain things that are inquired about. There is no positive, direct, unqualified negative of an assertion contained in the resolution. There is more backing and filling than anything else.

I wish to repeat, because I do not want the country to get a misapprehension, that I have not the slightest feeling against the gentleman who occupies the position of Secretary of the Treasury of the United States. I barely know him when I meet him. I do not sympathize with him politically; but it is possible for a man to be a gentleman and not be of my politics, and I recognize that fact and I recognize it in his case. It does not always argue, of course, that he is of the clearest political perception, but it is consistent with honesty and honesty of purpose. Therefore I have no motive in the prosecution of this inquiry other than to afford the country that light to which it is entitled respecting the handling of the public funds.

There may be those, sir, who will say that I am actuated by partisan motives. I presume I will be subjected to that charge, certainly to the imputation; but I protest that I am big enough to rise above partisanship and become a patriot before I am a partisan. I can put aside my partisanship, and very frequently do. It does not argue because I am not of the political faith of the Secretary of the Treasury, whatever his political faith may be, that therefore I am actuated by any other than a proper motive in inquiring into his official conduct. I do not understand how his partisan friends can come to his rescue and undertake to block this inquiry.

This morning, when I introduced a resolution of inquiry, objection came with the speed of lightning from the storm cloud, and under the rules of the Senate the resolution went over until to-morrow, and to-morrow will determine its fate, I suppose. The country will understand after to-morrow, if that resolution shall be sent by a vote of the Senate to the Committee on Finance, that that is an end of the inquiry. That is the way we kill resolutions and kill inquiries here—send them to some committee dominated by the friends of the interest that the inquiry is to affect.

Now, what do the letters constituting the correspondence between the National City Bank of New York and the Treasury Department, which can not be disputed or questioned, establish? That correspondence demonstrates that the independent banking system, which was established by this Government a half century ago or more, is entirely broken. The banks have unrestricted and unrestrained rights, according to modern practices, to invade the Treasury Department and carry off the funds of the taxpayers and conduct private business upon those funds. It establishes that these favors granted the National City Bank were in consideration of its political influence, and in consideration of the contributions of that bank and its directors to the Republican campaign fund of 1896.

Mr. Hepburn, in his letter importuning the Secretary of the Treasury to make his bank the recipient of this tremendous sum of money, put it upon the sole and express ground that his bank, and the directors of the bank, were contributors to the Republican campaign fund of 1896. He did not put it upon the ground that his bank had better facilities than any other bank to transact the business. It was a quid pro quo: "We helped the Republican party in 1896 to get control of the Government; we contributed of our funds to corrupt and debauch the ballot box, and now we ask as our consideration for it that we be given the right to transact business upon the Government's money, upon the money of the taxpayers of this nation."

It establishes that shortly after the request was made the Government deposits in that bank ran up from $200,000 to $24,000,000, and that for ten months there was carried of Government money in that bank, without any interest coming to the Government, in round numbers, between ten and eleven million dollars. It establishes the fact that the Treasury Department of the United States, under the control of Mr. Gage, is paying off the political debts of the Republican party.

I asked yesterday, and I ask you gentlemen upon the other side of the Chamber now, when you come to reply to me, if you do me that honor, to point out an instance in all the history of your party and its domination of national affairs where it has come to the assistance of the agricultural or the industrial interests of the country. You may say by putting money in the banks in New York it enables them to distribute it and sift it out through the country, and the people get the benefit of it. That is a poor way to distribute the funds of the taxpayers of this nation.

Suppose a whole city were stricken with famine, and the Secretary of the Treasury should select some one bank in that city in which to deposit money, enabling the people to go there and borrow of that bank at its own rate of interest, and thus become the victim of that organization, and when they appealed to him that the money belonged to them as much as to the bank he should say to them, "I have complied with all the reasonable requirements of the situation in putting your own money into the hands of this bank to loan to you." Would that be right? The Secretary of the Treasury centralized this money in the hands of one organization, and in the hands of that organization solely because it had been a liberal contributor to the campaign fund of the party which he represents.

This correspondence, Mr. President, establishes a direct connection between the Treasury Department of the United States and the Standard Oil Company. There is an unbroken line that leads from the office of Lyman J. Gage to the office of John D. Rockefeller, in New York; and as one humble citizen of this nation, and a representative in part of a great agricultural tax-paying people, I protest in the Senate of the United States that Mr. Rockefeller and the Standard Oil Company shall not have any influence or control over the Treasury of my nation.

Mr. President, this correspondence discloses that even Mr. Gage, during these transactions, was a little shy about meeting Mr. Morgan. He did not like to be caught in bad company, I suppose. So when it was suggested that Mr. Morgan should meet him in Washington, he said no; that he was going to Philadelphia to enjoy a little dinner given by the Bank of North America in his honor, and when there he would meet at the Walton Hotel, he said, fixing the hour, Mr. Morgan and such other gentlemen as might desire to confer with him.

I have always understood that Mr. Morgan is a great financier, accepted as such not only in the city of New York, but in this country and in Europe. What was there about Mr. Morgan or the interest he represented that made the Secretary of the Treasury hesitate to meet him openly in the Treasury Department in this city? Did Morgan propose to come to him with a proposition that was reprehensible and that would excite the resentment of the people or excite their distrust? Evidently so, or the Secretary of the Treasury would have received Mr. Morgan with the same grace and the same courtesy with which he should receive the humblest citizen of this nation. But he did not want to do that.

So the correspondence establishes, what has been charged and what has been believed, that the Treasury Department is owned and dominated and controlled, throughout its length and its breadth, by the sharks and the gamblers of Wall street. The money of the people—the money of the 70,000,000 people who live in this land between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans and between Canada and the Gulf of Mexico, is put by the chief financial officer of the nation into these banks as a gratuity, that they in turn may transact private business on it and enhance their fortunes.

Mr. President, they were reaching out for everything in sight, and they will get it, too (it is only a question of time); and so they wanted the business of the United States with the Philippines. They wanted to handle all the money of the United States.

I say to you, gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber, that 60 per cent of the money of the United States to-day that belongs in the Treasury Department is to be found in certain favored national banks as a gratuity to their owners.

You may say the law gives the Secretary of the Treasury a right to select a national bank as a depositary, and in a qualified sense that is true, but not in the sense he would have us believe. He has a right to make a national bank a financial agent for the purpose of distributing money to the Army and Navy and contractors, and make other necessary distributions, to use it as a tentative means to the accomplishment of those ends. But it never was the intention of Congress or of the people of the United States that those banks should have the privilege of holding for an indefinite length of time unlimited sums of the Government's money.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Nebraska allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ALLEN. I will; yes, sir.

Mr. SPOONER. Would the Senator think it would better serve the public interest to have it locked up in the Treasury, out of circulation?

Mr. ALLEN. It would serve the public interest just as well as to have it in circulation by the National City Bank, and it certainly would be safe; at least it would be where the people of the United States suppose it is and where by law it ought to be. Why, Mr. President, the Senator is taking exactly the tack I expected he would take, and he is capable of making the worse appear to be the better cause. I say this in compliment to his ability. He will stand on this floor and, with his magnificent presence and his splendid eloquence, he will defend the conduct of the Treasury Department.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator did not answer my question.

Mr. ALLEN. Oh, I thought I did.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLAY in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPOONER. I asked the Senator whether it would be better for the public interest to have the money in the Treasury or all of it in a single bank. I simply asked him the question whether it would be better in his judgment for the public interest to have it in the national banks of the country or locked up in the Treasury.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not think it would be anything for the public interest to have it in the national banks.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator would rather have it locked up in the Treasury?

Mr. ALLEN. When it would have to go there and pay the banks interest on it.

Mr. SPOONER. But if locked up in the Treasury they could not get it at all.

Mr. ALLEN. There is where it belongs. If you levy that money off the people it belongs in the Treasury Department. But the vice lies deeper than that, Mr. President, and the Senator can not escape through that avenue. You have taxed the people of the United States beyond all reason, and you have put a surplus in the Treasury of the United States that has no business there and that ought to be in circulation among the people from whence it came.

By the sale of Government bonds, $200,000,000 of bonds, by the levy of a tremendous war tax, by the increase of duties under the Dingley Act, you have wrung from the people of the United States, the hard-working classes, almost $300,000,000, that are under the control of the Treasury Department to-day, the most of it in the national banks, in favored banks. There has not been a step taken to repeal or modify one of these acts, so that this tremendous sum of money may get out among the people again and there remain where it belongs.

Until you repeal those laws or modify them and prevent this tremendous congestion of money you will not be able to deceive the people of the United States by saying that you have a large surplus there that ought to be in circulation. Repeal your tax or modify it and the money will not accumulate there, and you will not have the privilege of paying off your political debts by the use of public money.

I realize, Mr. President, as fully as any man can realize that it is a hopeless and futile task for me to stand here and ask for an investigation. I do not expect an investigation. I would be surprised if it came. The Republican party has a majority in this Chamber by some 13 or 14. It is as complete a political machine as was ever organized upon this continent. It stands together and obeys the dictates of the caucus. When any resolution comes before this body for an investigation of this or any other transaction of a questionable character, you will see that side rise and vote against it as one man, with absolute unanimity.

The caucus has done the work. I thank God I am not the victim of caucus dictation and I never will be. I have a party of my own, and we can hold our caucus in the elevator. A man must subordinate his judgment, his conviction of right and wrong, to the voice of a mere majority, and he must walk up and take his medicine whether he wants to or not if the caucus says so. I know that there are gentlemen on that side of the Chamber who think this matter ought to be investigated, but who will be compelled by caucus dictation to vote against the resolution.

No, Mr. President, I am not foolish enough to suppose that any investigation will ever be had. This resolution in the course of time will be duly embalmed by the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], and it will be taken into the political crypt, into the room of the Committee on Finance of the United States Senate, and there with befitting rites, Mr. President, with hymn and song and ceremony, presided over by the splendid genius of my friend from Rhode Island, it will be buried so deep that the music of Gabriel's horn will never reach it. The people will ask, What has become of this resolution? They think the Senate of the United States is engaged in transacting the public business upon lofty ideas of the wants and demands of the country. They do not understand that the game of party politics opens with the opening of the Senate and closes with its adjournment.

Mr. President, it may be that there will come from the North and the South and the East and the West a storm of indignation that will drive the Republican membership of this Chamber into an investigation. If that time comes and the clouds grow dark and the sky ominous, then the chief of the ceremonials of interment will bring out the corpse of this resolution and it will be passed in an emaciated and emasculated form.

Mr. SPOONER. The committee will not emasculate it. It will not be the committee that will emasculate the resolution.

Mr. ALLEN. Oh, yes; the committee will do this work. It will be instructed by the caucus what to do, and it will never fail. It will execute its orders, as the old-time executioner executed the orders of the council of state. There will be no trouble about that.

But, Mr. President, I propose to do my duty as far as I understand it. I am in the minority, it is true, but before free debate is finally cut off in this Chamber, as this morning's proceedings would indicate it is to be, I want to raise my voice in protest against this method of conducting the public business. There will come a time no doubt when we shall be cut off here entirely and a czar rule of procedure will be adopted to prevent the exposure of this and like public iniquities which are taking place from time to time.

Mr. President, nothing is to be gained to me nor to the cause I represent by protracting this discussion, and I do not propose to protract it any length of time. If this evidence were submitted to a jury on the question whether the Secretary of the Treasury had violated the obligation of the discharge of his plain duty, under proper instructions to that jury as to an interpretation of the law, there would be no question of the return of a verdict of guilty.

But, Mr. President, the violation of statutes, the violation of their letter, the violation of their spirit, the violation of their purpose, has become so common and of such constant practice that we seem to think it is all right to do so, after all.

A law, Mr. President, is made to be obeyed, not to be violated; and it is the spirit and policy and purpose of the law that is to be obeyed, for that is the law. When our ancestors established an independent Treasury Department for the purpose of divorcing the national finances from the banks of the country and required our money to be kept in that independent Treasury, they intended that the law should be executed in good faith; and when a great officer, charged as a trustee with the custody of millions of dollars of the money wrung from the taxpayers of this nation to pay off its obligations and its current expenses, takes the money with which he is intrusted and goes outside of the Treasury and places it in private institutions to advance and promote the interests of favorite corporations and favorite individuals, he is guilty of an open and flagrant violation of the law. I say this, as I said a moment ago, in absolute personal kindness to the gentleman who presides over the financial affairs of this nation.

Who has ever heard of the Secretary of the Treasury going out to the people and talking with them on this subject? Has he called together the representative organizations of this nation, the great laboring organizations, the Grange, the Farmers' Alliance, the great organizations of agriculturists, and said anything to them? No; they are beneath his notice; they are not of his make; they are not of his class. They, Mr. President, are mere taxpayers in his opinion, and unworthy of notice. When this gentleman wants to talk about financial matters he puts on his dress suit and goes to New York or Philadelphia and sits down to a "little dinner" given by his friends, the bankers. There, without letting the people know anything about it, they parcel out the money of the taxpayers to the advantage of themselves, their friends, and their party. To this he willingly assents.

SENATOR FROM PENNSYLVANIA—THE FINANCIAL BILL.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I rise to a privileged question, for the purpose of giving notice that on Monday, after the routine morning business is finished, I shall call up the resolution before the Senate in reference to the vacant seat in this body from the State of Pennsylvania; and I ask Senators who intend to speak upon that question to kindly prepare themselves as soon as convenient.

Mr. ALDRICH. I did not understand the notice given or suggestion made by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. CHANDLER. I shall call up the Pennsylvania election case on Monday.

Mr. ALDRICH. At what time?

Mr. CHANDLER. After the routine morning business. I think the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TURLEY] may be ready at that time to speak on the question, unless the Senate refuses to consider the subject.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator is aware that at 2 o'clock the unfinished business is made the order by the unanimous-consent agreement of the Senate; and I give notice that I shall object to any order or business of any kind interfering with that order of the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. I understand that. It is very possible that the junior Senator from Tennessee may finish before 2 o'clock. It is my desire that the consideration of the election case shall begin on Monday and that the junior Senator from Tennessee shall speak on that day.

Mr. BURROWS. I would suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections that whenever that case is taken up for consideration it is desirable that its consideration be continued without interruption until it is concluded. To take up the case on Monday and have an argument made upon it, and then another on Tuesday and so on, from day to day, and possibly from week to week, to have some remarks made upon the case, is not the best way to consider and determine it. I therefore hope that the motion will not be pressed by the chairman, certainly in view of the fact, as he knows, that we are engaged every moment in a hearing before the Committee on Privileges and Elections in another matter, which is liable to occupy the attention of the committee every day next week.

Mr. CHANDLER. I would be very glad to have the case taken up and considered in the way the Senator from Michigan suggests it ought to be—that is, by continuous consideration—but no one knows any better than the Senator from Michigan that questions are never so considered in the Senate. They are taken up and speeches are made, and they are dropped until other speeches are ready. Every important subject that has ever been under discussion in this body, according to my recollection, has been dealt with in that way.

We must begin to make some progress. Now, the junior Senator from Tennessee informs me that he will be ready on Monday. I know the Senator from Michigan is thoroughly prepared to make a long speech on the same side. We are very anxious to have those speeches before the Senate so that Senators may consider them before the vote is taken. I think it is due to the fact that here is a vacant seat in this body that we should make all the progress possible with that case. Therefore, I shall urge its consideration on Monday.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President——

Mr. BURROWS. If the Senator from Connecticut will pardon me, I ought to say, in reply to the statement of the Senator from New Hampshire, that he is possessed of information which I do not have—namely, that I shall be prepared to speak on Monday and am anxious to do so. I am not prepared to speak on the case, and I shall not be prepared at that time, for the reasons I have already stated—that the committee has been engaged every day in the consideration of other matters, and it has been impossible for me to give any consideration to that case.

I repeat what I said, that in this case and in the consideration of any case of this character, involving the right of a Senator to his seat, the discussion ought to be, whenever it is entered upon, continued.

Mr. CHANDLER. Has the Senator ever known of such a thing since he has been in the Senate?

Mr. BURROWS. I do not know that I have; but if it never has been done it ought to be done now. A couple of days, probably, will dispose of the case, and I would prefer that whenever it is taken up it be considered continuously until a vote is taken.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not object to that; but I shall call up the case at the conclusion of the routine morning business on Monday. The Senator from Rhode Island will please take notice.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, the intimation was made here this morning that because a notice had been given, therefore the Senate was bound to follow that notice. I will give notice to the Senator from New Hampshire that I do not intend to follow that course, and that at 2 o'clock on each day I shall insist that the unfinished business be considered by the Senate, to the exclusion of everything else, until it is disposed of.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not want to interfere with that. I agree that as the financial bill is to be voted upon a week from next Thursday, if anybody wants to speak on that subject, he should have the preference. It is the universal experience in the Senate that we have two or three subjects running along together, and I intend that this privileged question concerning a vacant seat in the Senate shall have its chance.

Mr. ALDRICH. There are four vacant seats in the Senate, as I understand it; I presume one of them is no more privileged than any other and that it is a matter for the Senate itself to determine.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator only fortifies my remarks. There are four vacant seats in this body which may be influenced by a decision of the question in the Pennsylvania case. Therefore it is of such importance that nothing should interfere with it except the bill which the Senator from Rhode Island has in charge, and that should interfere with it only because there has been an agreement to vote a week from next Thursday. If it were wisely disposed of, it would be indefinitely postponed.

TRANSACTIONS WITH NEW YORK CITY BANKS.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, I do not know that it is of any particular importance, but I should like to say now, while this matter of procedure in the Senate is under consideration and may to some extent be affected by the notice which has been given by the Senator from New Hampshire, that I think there ought to be an opportunity given at the next session of the Senate for some observations, brief perhaps, in reply to the somewhat remarkable attack which has been made during the last two mornings by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] upon the Secretary of the Treasury, both in his official and personal capacity. I do not know whether the Senator from Nebraska has concluded his attack or not.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understood that Senator to say he was through.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. He certainly has not published his remarks which he submitted yesterday, and I do think that while that matter is before the Senate there ought to be a little opportunity given to say something upon that subject. I think it ought to be done on the next morning when the Senate shall be in session.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, will it not suit the convenience of the Senator from New Hampshire to call up the Pennsylvania case on Wednesday? An elaborate speech has been made here by the Senator from Nebraska, which has not yet appeared in the RECORD, of course, arraigning the Secretary of the Treasury and challenging somewhat the integrity of the management of the Treasury Department, and I for one desire to submit to the Senate some observations in reply to it. I think the case to which the Senator refers will suffer not at all by being postponed until Wednesday.

SENATOR FROM PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, my attention has been called at this moment to the notice given by the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY] that on Monday, February 5, he would address the Senate with reference to the Philippine Islands. His address will probably take the morning hour. Under the circumstances I agree to the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin and give notice that I will call up the Pennsylvania case on Wednesday morning after the routine business is finished.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire gives notice as indicated. The next business in order is the unfinished business.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. ALDRICH. I greatly regret that there seems to be no one ready to discuss the bill which is the unfinished business. I hope that the Senators upon the other side of the Chamber are not going to abandon the silver question or the money question, as I see it sometimes stated in the newspapers they intend to do, and I will certainly hope——

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Rhode Island has made such a vigorous plea in favor of its retaining its place that I do not suppose there is very much need on this side. I understood the Senator in his various colloquies to insist that it was not put out of question by this bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. I insist that the bill shall remain before the Senate; but the time fixed for the discussion and debate and the final voting on the bill was postponed in order that Senators on the other side might get ready to debate the question.

Mr. CHILTON. We want some division of debate. You were going to make some speeches on the other side.

Mr. ALDRICH. We are quite content with the debate which has already taken place.

Mr. CHILTON. Then the Senator ought not to be complaining.

Mr. ALDRICH. We are quite ready to take a vote on the bill; and I suggest that if it is not the intention to discuss it further we come to an agreement to vote at once.

Mr. CHANDLER. No; I am going to make a speech on the other side.

Mr. ALDRICH. I expected that; it is well understood.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It is perfectly well known that a number of Senators propose to make speeches on this bill. One Senator, for instance, has been wanting to speak for the last two or three days, but he is now out of the city, supposing that the Senate would, as usual, adjourn over Friday and Saturday. The Senator from Rhode Island need not distress himself about any failure to have his bill sufficiently discussed. It seems to me that it has already been completely torn to shreds, and if the Senator had followed the debate as far as it has gone he would not think there was any necessity for anything else to be said to absolutely use it up.

Mr. ALDRICH. The speeches to which the Senator alludes must have been made when I was absent from the Chamber.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Most of them have been made while the Senator was absent, as he usually is.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator will let us go to the Calendar for a few minutes.

Mr. DAVIS. There is some executive business which I think ought to be attended to.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us go to the Calendar for thirty minutes.

Mr. DAVIS. Very well; I will give way for thirty minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota withdraw his motion?

Mr. DAVIS. I withdraw it, and will renew it at the expiration of half an hour.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the Calendar be proceeded with in its regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first bill on the Calendar will be announced.

JOSEPH W. CARMACK.

The bill (S. 423) for the relief of Joseph W. Carmack was announced as the first bill on the Calendar, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. Howell, of Company H, Fifty-fourth Regiment Illinois Infantry Volunteers, and to issue to him an honorable discharge as of date July 31, 1865.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PERRY J. KNOLES.

Knoles, a private of Company E, One hundred and first Regiment Illinois Infantry Volunteers, by removing the charge of desertion, and substituting therefor, "Absented himself from Benton Barracks in January, 1863, and was enrolled under the name of James Maddux on July 29, 1863, at Camp Dennison, Ohio, and mustered into service August 5, 1863, as a private in Company B, Second Ohio Heavy Artillery Volunteers, to serve three years, and served faithfully until he was honorably discharged at Knoxville, Tenn., on May 11, 1865," and provides that no pay or allowance shall be given him during his absence without leave by virtue of this act.

McConnaughay, and that Isaac McConnaughay shall hereafter be held and considered to have been in the military service of the United States as a member of said organization from the 14th of August, 1862, until honorably discharged from the service; but he shall not be entitled to any pay, bounty, or allowances by any reason of the relief granted.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to amend, in line 5, on page 2, by striking out the word "any," before the word "reason;" so as to read:

That he shall not be entitled to any pay, bounty, or allowances by reason of the relief herein granted.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MEDALS FOR GALLANTRY IN REVENUE-CUTTER SERVICE.

The joint resolution (S. R. 51) recognizing the gallantry of Frank H. Newcomb, commanding the revenue cutter Hudson; of his officers and men; also retiring Capt. Daniel B. Hodgsdon, of the Revenue-Cutter Service, for efficient and meritorious services in command of the cutter Hugh McCulloch at Manila, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that there may be published in the RECORD, in connection with the joint resolution which has just been passed, the report made regarding it, so that the reason for its passage will appear.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I hope that will be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] will be complied with in the absence of objection. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

The report referred to, which was submitted by Mr. MCMILLAN from the Committee on Commerce January 4, 1900, is as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the joint resolution recognizing the gallantry of Lieut. Frank H. Newcomb, commanding the revenue cutter Hudson; of his officers and men; also retiring Capt. Daniel B. Hodgsdon, of the Revenue-Cutter Service, for efficient and meritorious service in command of the cutter McCulloch at Manila, having duly considered the same, report with a recommendation that it pass.

The facts in the case are fully presented in the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury and the accompanying papers, which are appended and made a part of this report.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., December 16, 1899.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 12th instant, referring to me joint resolution (S. R. 25), Fifty-sixth Congress, first session, "Recognizing the gallantry of Lieut. Frank H. Newcomb, commanding the revenue cutter Hudson; of his officers and men; also retiring Capt. Daniel B. Hodgsdon, of the Revenue-Cutter Service, for efficient and meritorious services in command of the cutter McCulloch at Manila," and requesting me to furnish the committee with such suggestions as I may deem proper touching the merits of the joint resolution and the propriety of its passage.

I respectfully return herewith the resolution referred to and cordially recommend the passage of the same.

There was no more heroic action performed during the Spanish war than that by Lieutenant Newcomb, his officers and men, at the battle of Cardenas, May 11, 1898, and no more efficient and meritorious service than that performed by Captain Hodgsdon, commanding the McCulloch, at Manila.

A joint resolution similar to this was passed by the Senate (Fifty-fifth Congress) June 29, 1898. In this connection I transmit herewith the following papers:

Three reports by Lieutenant Newcomb on the part of his command at the battle of Cardenas, Cuba.

A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, commending the gallantry of Lieutenant Newcomb.

A letter by Admiral George Dewey, commending Capt. D. B. Hodgsdon, of the McCulloch, at the battle of Manila.

Copy of the message of the President to the Fifty-fifth Congress, recommending recognition of the services of Newcomb and Hodgsdon.

Respectfully,

L. J. GAGE, Secretary.

Hon. WILLIAM P. FRYE,
Chairman Committee on Commerce, United States Senate.

To the Congress of the United States:

On the 11th of May, 1898, there occurred a conflict in the bay of Cardenas, Cuba, in which the naval torpedo boat Winslow was disabled, her commander wounded, and one of her officers and a part of her crew killed by the enemy's fire.

In the face of a most galling fire from the enemy's guns the revenue cutter Hudson, commanded by First Lieut. Frank H. Newcomb, United States Revenue-Cutter Service, rescued the disabled Winslow, her wounded commander, and remaining crew. The commander of the Hudson kept his vessel in the very hottest fire of the action, although in constant danger of going ashore on account of the shallow water, until he finally got a line made fast to the Winslow and towed that vessel out of range of the enemy's guns, a deed of special gallantry.

I recommend that, in recognition of the signal act of heroism of First Lieut. Frank H. Newcomb, United States Revenue-Cutter Service, above set forth, the thanks of Congress be extended to him and to his officers and men of the Hudson, and that a gold medal of honor be presented to Lieutenant Newcomb, a silver medal of honor to each of his officers, and a bronze medal of honor to each member of his crew who served with him at Cardenas.

It will be remembered that Congress, by appropriate action, recognized the several commanders of ships of war for their services in the battle of Manila, May 1, 1898.

The commander of the revenue cutter Hugh McCulloch, present and in active cooperation with the fleet under Commodore Dewey on that occasion (by Executive order, under the provisions of section 2757, Revised Statutes), is the only commander of a national ship to whom promotion or advancement was not and could not be given, because he already held the highest rank known to the Revenue-Cutter Service.

I now recommend that in recognition of the efficient and meritorious services of Capt. Daniel B. Hodgsdon, United States Revenue-Cutter Service, who commanded the Hugh McCulloch at the battle of Manila (that officer being now in the sixty-third year of his age, and having served continuously on active duty for thirty-seven years), be placed upon the permanent waiting orders or retired list of the Revenue-Cutter Service on the full duty pay of his grade.

WILLIAM McKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, June 27, 1898.

UNITED STATES NAVAL FORCE ON ASIATIC STATION, FLAGSHIP OLYMPIA,
Cavite, Philippine Islands, June 12, 1898.

SIR: 1. I take pleasure in bringing to the attention of the Department the zeal and efficiency of Capt. Daniel B. Hodgsdon, Revenue-Cutter Service, commanding the McCulloch, while serving in the squadron under my command.

2. The McCulloch steamed from Hongkong to Manila Bay in the squadron formation and ran the batteries at the entrance with the squadron, and, while not placed in the line of battle at the battle of Manila Bay, was kept near by and in readiness to assist any vessel that might be disabled.

3. Since joining my command, and up to the time of his detachment, Captain Hodgsdon has kept the McCulloch in a high state of efficiency and ready to move at a moment's notice, and made her a valuable auxiliary to the squadron.

4. I request that the Department will communicate this report to the honorable the Secretary of the Treasury.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

GEORGE DEWEY,
Rear-Admiral, United States Navy,
Commanding United States Naval Force on Asiatic Station.

The SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, D. C.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, D. C., June 15, 1898.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 9th instant and to forward herewith a copy of the report requested. I regret that inadvertently a copy of this letter was not forwarded to you immediately after it was received.

The rescue of the Winslow by the Hudson was so gallantly done, in the face of a most galling fire, that First Lieut. Frank H. Newcomb, Revenue-Cutter Service, commanding, his officers and men, deserve the warmest commendation. The Winslow was riddled with shell, disabled, helplessly drifting onto the beach into the hands of the enemy, her captain wounded, her only other officer and half her crew killed, but the Hudson courageously remained by her in the very center of the hottest fire of the action, although in constant danger of going ashore on account of the shallow water, until finally a line was made fast to the Winslow and that vessel towed out of range of the enemy's guns.

Very respectfully,

JOHN D. LONG,
Secretary.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

U. S. S. HUDSON,
Key West, Fla., May 13, 1898.

SIR: In obedience to Department order of the 19th instant I have the honor to submit the following full detailed report of the part taken by my command in cooperation with vessels of the Navy in the recent action at Cardenas, Cuba.

At daylight on the morning of the 11th instant the Hudson was cruising on blockade duty off Cardenas, about 6 miles north of Cruz del Padre light-house, in company with the U. S. S. Machias. The smoke of a steamer approaching from the eastward was discovered, and the Hudson was pointed for it under a full head of steam. As soon as near enough to ascertain the steamer to be the U. S. S. Wilmington the Hudson was headed to the westward, following the Machias toward the day anchorage under Piedras Cay. As we rounded Mona Cay the Machias signaled, "Regulate your movements by this vessel," which was done.

The Machias led the way in by Piedras Cay and up the outer bay, and at about 9 o'clock came to anchor 1¼ miles NNE. of Diana Cay, one of the islands guarding the inner approaches to Cardenas Bay. At this time three Spanish gunboats were observed in the western part of the bay, 4 or 5 miles distant, steaming slowly toward Cardenas.

Upon approaching within hail the Hudson was ordered by the Machias to proceed up toward two sunken sloops in the channel on the east side of Diana Cay, look around, and see what could be found. As an impression prevailed on board that torpedoes had been planted in this channel, I asked the Machias, "Do you want us to go up to those sunken vessels?" The answer was, "No; be very careful."

The Hudson then proceeded very slowly up the channel, sounding constantly and carefully feeling the way, going ahead and backing on the engine as occasion required. Oftentimes there was less than 6 inches of water under her. She was drawing 9 feet 4 inches aft. In about an hour we had worked up to within 100 yards of the sunken sloops. Then, finding deeper water to the eastward, we worked around inside of them and stopped, not feeling justified under our orders to proceed farther into the bay.

The largest Spanish gunboat came within about 3 miles of us, evidently watching our movements. After lying still ten minutes about half a mile east of Diana Cay, and finding that the enemy's gunboat was not disposed to come any nearer, we returned to the Machias, reporting alongside about 11 o'clock. We were then ordered to report to the Wilmington, which vessel and the torpedo boat Winslow had joined the Machias during our absence. By the Wilmington we were ordered to proceed with the Winslow and sound out the channel between Romero and the largest of the Blanco Cays, and to sweep it with our small boats for torpedoes. We started right away, following the Winslow, which by reason of her superior speed soon distanced us. When off the eastern end of Romero Cay, while running at full speed, the Hudson grounded and stopped, with only 7 feet of water under her. After several ineffectual attempts to back off, the 6-pounder ammunition in the after hold was carried forward, and finally the Hudson was backed off into deeper water. We then sounded our way down the channel about a mile, when we met the Wilmington coming slowly in.

All three vessels then proceeded into the bay, the Wilmington in the center, with the Winslow on her port bow and the Hudson on the starboard. After proceeding in this manner for several miles, the Hudson was ordered to fall back upon the Wilmington's starboard quarter, clear of her guns, supplemented by, "When you get up there, gather in all you can." The Winslow occupied a similar position on the opposite side.

About 1 p. m., when nearly abreast of Corogal Point, the Hudson was ordered by the Wilmington to "Go out and look for small craft." Accordingly we started over to the northward, toward Diana Cay, and circled along the western shore of the bay, standing as near in to the land as the shoal water would permit. In crossing the main ship channel three black buoys were seen in line, about half a mile apart, which were avoided for fear they marked torpedoes or mines. Finally, at 1.35 p. m., not having seen vessels of any kind whatever on that side of the bay, we steamed at full speed toward the Wilmington and Winslow, now nearing Cardenas.

At 1.45 p. m. they had arrived off the city and were steaming to the eastward along the water front, probably 1½ miles offshore. Suddenly the Winslow dashed in toward the wharves, and when about 1,800 yards distant, the smoke of a gun fired from the center of the city front was observed. Both vessels immediately returned the fire; more guns followed from the shore, and when we arrived at the scene, about ten minutes later, a general engagement was in progress. The Hudson steamed in between a bark and a full-rigged brig lying at anchor, and taking a position about 1,800 yards from the shore, off the western end of the city, opened fire with her two 6-pounder Driggs-Schroeder guns upon the enemy's battery, which could only be located by the smoke from the guns. Meantime the Wilmington had turned and was steaming slowly to the westward, outside of the Hudson. The Winslow still maintained her original position when first fired upon. After firing several rounds from the Hudson's guns it was seen that she would soon be in line with the Wilmington's fire. Accordingly we ran out around the latter vessel to obtain a clearer field for our operations. Passing within hail of the Wilmington, I asked, pointing toward the Winslow, "Shall I go down there and pitch in?" The answer was, "Yes."

Up to this time I had received no official intimation whatever as to the object in view, nor what part the Hudson was expected to take in the affair. A signal had been flying from the Wilmington's masthead for some time, which could not be made out from the Hudson. What it signified I have never been informed.

The Hudson ran in at full speed until about 150 yards inshore of the Winslow and a short distance to the eastward, when the engine was stopped and firing resumed with the two 6-pounders. Upon our original entry into the engagement the first two or three shells from each gun struck the water a trifle short of the city front, but after that all of our shells appeared to land in among the buildings on shore, some of them in close proximity to the enemy's guns.

After having been in action a few minutes it was noticed that the Winslow was moving about in a very strange and erratic manner, and it was found quite difficult at times to avoid a collision with her. She was darting back and forth in line with the city front, and as the fire of the enemy appeared to be directed mainly upon her it was concluded finally that she was being maneuvered in this way to avoid the fixed, concentrated range of their guns. It was afterwards learned that one of her boilers and the steering engine had been struck and disabled, and that her commander was trying to point either end of her offshore in order to withdraw.

The enemy's shells were falling and bursting all over and around the two vessels, and why the Hudson was not seriously damaged by them is beyond comprehension. I saw one shell, that passed close over the top of our pilot house, strike the Winslow, but fortunately it failed to burst. Another shell, apparently a large one, passed close to us, and, striking the water alongside the Wilmington, half a mile outside, threw a column of spray nearly as high as her bridge. The use of smokeless powder in some of the enemy's guns made it impossible to locate them; but their marksmanship was very poor, and many of their shells struck the water a long way inside of us. We had been firing steadily for about twenty minutes, most of the time lying inshore of the Winslow, and often between her and the enemy's guns as we maneuvered for position, when it was reported to me that she was probably disabled. I immediately offered assistance to her commanding officer, which he declined by a negative shake of the head. Ten or fifteen minutes later, when we were to windward and outside of the Winslow, he reported his vessel as totally disabled, and requested to be towed out of range of the enemy's guns. This was the first definite information received on board the Hudson of the Winslow's condition.

There was quite a fresh breeze blowing obliquely on shore from the eastward, and the Winslow was making so much leeway in consequence, and constantly shoaling the water, that I found it very difficult to bring the Hudson in position to throw a line to her. Our propeller was constantly stirring up the bottom, and steerageway was invariably lost as soon as the speed slackened. It was upward of thirty minutes before we succeeded in getting hold of the Winslow's towline and started ahead with her. While making the effort the Wilmington had been firing over us, and a number of her shells exploded upon leaving the guns, the fragments striking the water all around us.

We were within 100 feet of the Winslow when a shell exploded killing Ensign Bagley and three men, and the sad casualty was distinctly visible to most of our officers and crew. The Wilmington fired the last guns in the engagement, apparently silencing the enemy's batteries. When we started ahead with the Winslow, the Wilmington was nearly a mile distant, steaming out to windward. The Hudson followed slowly with the Winslow. The latter vessel's steering gear being disabled, she was yawing about wildly, and we had not proceeded more than a quarter of a mile when the towline parted.

It was a matter of only a few minutes to get out another towline, and then we went ahead again. After a long and laborious chase dead to windward, we finally overtook the Wilmington, and hailing her requested that the doctor be sent on board the Winslow. Both vessels had been attempting to wigwag the same message to the Wilmington for some time previously.

After the dead and wounded had been transferred to the Wilmington, we made fast alongside the Winslow in an endeavor to tow her in that manner. But owing to the roughness of the bay it was found that the water thrown up between the two vessels was likely to sink the Winslow in her shattered and disabled state, so the attempt was abandoned. About 4 p. m. we started out of the bay with the Winslow in tow astern, following in the wake of the Wilmington. We arrived alongside the Machias at dark, and at 9.30 p. m., dropping the torpedo boat, started for Key West with dispatches and the dead and wounded from the Winslow, arriving there at 7.30 on the following morning.

While I may not particularize any individual act of heroism during the action without doing an injustice to others equally as meritorious, I take great pleasure in directing the attention of the Department to the cool and efficient manner in which each and every officer and member of the crew performed the duties intrusted to him.

Without the combined efforts of all hands on board this vessel, the Winslow and the surviving members of her crew would have been lost.

Respectfully, yours,

FRANK H. NEWCOMB,
First Lieutenant, R. C. S., Commanding.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, D. C.

U. S. S. HUDSON,
Key West, Fla., May 13, 1898.

SIR: I have the honor to submit the following report of the participation of this vessel in the engagement with the Spanish forces at Cardenas on the 11th instant.

At 11.30 a. m., while off the main entrance to Cardenas Bay, the Hudson was ordered by the senior officer present to accompany the U. S. S. Wilmington and the U. S. torpedo boat Winslow inside. All three vessels started immediately, and, after some preliminary soundings to determine the best water, passed through Blanco Channel into the bay and headed for Cardenas.

About 1 p. m., when abreast of Corogal Point, the Hudson was ordered by the commanding officer of the U. S. S. Wilmington to "go out and look at small craft." Steamed over toward Diana Cay and skirted the western shore of the bay. Discovered no vessels, and, observing that the Wilmington and Winslow were nearing Cardenas, at 1.35 p. m. steamed toward them at full speed.

At 1.45, when a little over a mile distant from our vessels, saw firing commence from shore, which was immediately returned by our ships. At 1.50, when within range of the shore guns, the Hudson opened fire upon them with her two 6-pounders. Observing that the Winslow was quite inshore and exposed to the full strength of the enemy's guns, ran up alongside of the Wilmington and asked if we should go to her assistance (Winslow). Received the answer, "Yes;" and at once steamed into the immediate vicinity of the Winslow, keeping up a constant and rapid fire from the Hudson's battery upon the enemy's guns on shore. At 2.20 commanding officer of the Winslow reported his vessel totally disabled, and requested to be towed out of range. Owing to the shoal water and the rapid drift toward shore of the Winslow (the wind was onshore), it was fully thirty minutes before the Hudson succeeded in making a line fast from the Winslow and started ahead with her. The enemy kept up a constant fire during this time, which appeared to be especially directed toward the Winslow, and which was returned at every opportunity by the Winslow and Hudson.

The Winslow was towed alongside the Wilmington, from which vessel a boat was sent with a medical officer, who transferred the dead and wounded from the Winslow to the Wilmington. Finally, at about 3.30 p. m., all three vessels steamed out of the bay, the Winslow in tow of the Hudson. At about dark joined the U. S. S. Machias outside, where the Winslow was anchored. At 9.15 p. m. the Hudson started for Key West with dispatches for the senior officer commanding that station, and carrying the dead and wounded from the Winslow. Reported to the senior officer commanding at Key West at 7.10 on the morning of the 12th instant. The only damage resulting to the Hudson during the engagement was a few slight marks from small projectiles upon two of the fire-room ventilators and a few bullet marks upon the outside of the pilot-house plating. One hundred and thirty-five shells were fired from the two 6-pounders during the action.

Respectfully, yours,

FRANK H. NEWCOMB,
First Lieutenant, R. C. S., Commanding.

The SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, D. C.

U. S. S. HUDSON,
Key West, Fla., June 16, 1898.

SIR: For the better information of the Department, I have the honor to submit the following supplementary report containing certain facts relating to the part taken by this vessel in the late engagement at Cardenas on the 11th ultimo, which were omitted in the hasty preparation of my report of the 31st ultimo.

The injuries sustained by the Hudson from the enemy's projectiles were as follows: The hull was struck in two places below the guards on the starboard side, and two places on the port side, one below the guards and the other on the after filling piece between the guards, evidently by a piece of a large projectile, as it left quite a deep dent in the hard wood. No damage resulted from the other places struck beyond knocking off the paint and scaling the iron at the points of contact.

The rudder on the port side where it joins the stock was struck once with similar results. The forward fire-room ventilator on the starboard side above the upper deck was struck four times, one only resulting in a perforation three-fourths of an inch in diameter. The after ventilator on the same side was struck once and perforated, the hole being about one-half of an inch in diameter.

The after end of the pilot house was spattered with numerous small pieces of lead, each of which was buried out of sight in the wood. The light joiner work of the cabin was shaken and shattered more or less by the fire of the after 6-pounder, while windows, lamp shades, and other fragile articles were smashed.

During the action 135 rounds were fired from the two 6-pounder guns. The Colt automatic gun on the upper deck was not used, its fire being reserved for short range in case the vessel became disabled and drifted near the shore.

Second Lieut. J. H. Scott was in charge of the after 6-pounder and Third Lieut. E. E. Mead of the forward one. The coolness and intrepidity manifested by these gentlemen in handling their respective gun's crews and taking advantage of every favorable opportunity to get in an effective shot at the enemy, and their efforts under the most trying circumstances to run lines to the disabled Winslow, are deserving of the highest commendation.

The professional skill and promptness displayed by Mr. N. E. Cutchin, the engineer (first assistant) in charge, in responding to the constant and exacting demands upon the machinery in maneuvering the vessel, merit unstinted praise. Not the slightest hitch or delay of any kind occurred in the workings of his department, and the successful issue of the day's operations was undoubtedly due in a great measure to his efforts and those of the men under him.

Whenever the services of Second Assistant Engineer T. D. Lewton could be spared from the engine and fire rooms he cheerfully repaired to the pilot house, where his aid in locating the other vessels and the direction of the enemy's guns, in the midst of the dense smoke from the Hudson's guns which at the time prevailed, was of the utmost assistance.

Each and every member of the crew, from the boatswain down to Moses Jones, the colored boy, who attached himself to the after gun and never failed to have a shell ready when it was needed, did his whole duty cheerfully and without the least hesitation. This appears the more remarkable in view of the fact that none of them had ever been under fire before, and that the guns were without protection or shelter of any kind. They deserve the most substantial recognition in the power of the Government for their heroic services upon this occasion.

I take pleasure in testifying to the remarkable bravery displayed by Lieutenant Bernadou and the men of the Winslow, and consider it as one of the greatest privileges of my life to have been an eyewitness of their conduct at a time when many men would have felt justified in abandoning all hope. With such officers and such men the American nation may well be proud of its Navy.

Respectfully, yours,

FRANK H. NEWCOMB,
First Lieutenant, R. C. S., Commanding.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, D. C.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of Senate bill 1590, for a public building at Providence, R. I., which has been reported favorably from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. ELKINS. Can not we proceed with the Calendar? We have only about eight minutes left for its consideration.

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope the Senator will allow the bill to which I have referred to be passed.

Mr. ELKINS. I must object. I want to get the bills through which I have reported, and two of them come next on the Calendar. If the bill of the Senator from Rhode Island is taken up, there will not be time enough left for their consideration.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. There will not be time to consider the bills referred to by the Senator from West Virginia within eight minutes. They are very important bills.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To which bills does the Senator refer?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The bills which are numbered 36 and 37 in the Order of Business.

Mr. COCKRELL. They are bills to extend the laws relating to commerce, navigation, and merchant seamen over Puerto Rico and the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Orders of Business 36, 37, and 39 can not be considered within the time allowed this morning.

Mr. COCKRELL. Of course it will be impossible to consider those bills under the five-minute rule.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I am ready to have any of those bills taken up at any time when they can be considered, but it can not be done this morning.

Mr. ELKINS. Under the circumstances I withdraw my objection to the request of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is withdrawn.

Mr. COCKRELL. I inquire what is the order of business on the Calendar of the bill in charge of the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. ALDRICH. It is not on the printed Calendar. It was reported this morning from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1590) for the erection of a public building at Providence, R. I. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to accept, as a donation from the city of Providence, R. I., a suitable lot of land situated in Exchange place, in that city, easterly of the east line of Exchange street extended, and to cause to be erected thereon a commodious and substantial building, with fireproof vaults, for the accommodation of the United States post-office, district and circuit courts, custom-house, internal-revenue and other Government civil offices in that city, and appropriates a sum not exceeding $1,500,000 for the erection of a building thereon.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MILITARY HOSPITAL, FORT LEAVENWORTH, KANS.

Mr. BAKER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution No. 6, which is the last one on the Calendar.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 6) authorizing the Secretary of War to use $60,000 of the appropriations for the support of the Regular and Volunteer Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, for the construction of a modern military hospital at Fort Leavenworth, Kans.

The joint resolution was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments, in line 4, after the word "dollars," to strike out "out" and insert "or so much thereof as may be necessary;" and in line 6, after the word "hospitals," to strike out "mentioned in said act, or so much thereof as may be necessary" and insert "by the act making appropriations for the support of the Regular and Volunteer Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, approved March 3, 1899;" so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to use the sum of $60,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of the amount appropriated for the construction and repair of hospitals by the act making appropriations for the support of the Regular and Volunteer Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, approved March 3, 1899, for the construction of a modern military post hospital at the said Fort Leavenworth, Kans., and the limit of cost of said hospital is fixed at said sum.

The amendments were agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

COMMUTATION OF RATIONS.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2727) authorizing payment of commutation of ration to the petty officers of the Navy who served on detached duty between March 1, 1898, and November 4, 1899.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SOUTH AFRICAN REPUBLIC.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Will the Senator withdraw the motion for a moment? I wish simply to offer a resolution, to lie over.

Mr. DAVIS. Very well; I withdraw the motion.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and ask that it may lie over—not on the table—so that I can speak to it on Monday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is simply offered as a resolution to go over under the rule?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas from the hour of achieving their own independence the people of the United States have regarded with sympathy the struggles of other people to free themselves from European domination: Therefore,

Resolved, That we watch with deep and abiding interest the heroic battle of the South African Republic against cruelty and oppression, and our best hopes go out for the full success of their determined contest for liberty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution goes over under the rule.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I notice that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY] has given notice that he will speak on Monday next on the resolution in regard to the Philippines. If there shall be time after that Senator shall have concluded, I wish to speak to this resolution.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] gave notice that he intended to make some remarks in answer to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. PETTIGREW. That may probably consume the time on Monday.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed with an amendment the concurrent resolution of the Senate to print 7,000 copies of so much of the civil report of Maj. Gen. John R. Brooke, military governor of the island of Cuba, made to the Adjutant-General of the United States Army, etc., in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 2431) to present to the city of Nashville, State of Tennessee, the cannon of the gunboat Nashville from which was fired the first shot in the Spanish-American war; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. DAVIS. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and twenty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, February 5, 1900, at 12 o'clock m.

MARINE-HOSPITAL PROPERTY, NEW ORLEANS, LA.

Mr. DAVEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 284) which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That permission and authority be, and they are hereby, granted to the Orleans levee board to move, without cost to the United States, the existing line of levee in front of the United States marine-hospital property in New Orleans, La., in the square bounded by State street, Henry Clay avenue, Tchoupitoulas street, and the Mississippi River; said line of levee to be moved outwardly in the direction of said river to the new line of levee established by the said Orleans levee board, and that the city of New Orleans be, and it is hereby, authorized to extend, lay out, open and to keep open, through the said marine-hospital property, the street known as Front street, 110 feet wide, extending from Penniston street to the upper limits of the city of New Orleans, a distance of about 5 miles, as provided for under ordinance of the city of New Orleans, No. 15080, council series, approved March 1, 1899:

SEC. 2. That jurisdiction, power, and authority be, and are hereby, recognized by the United States as existing in the city of New Orleans to regulate and make improvements in said street as thus opened and extended as fully and completely as over any other portion of said street, or as fully and completely as said city of New Orleans now has, by her charter and the laws of the State of Louisiana, power and authority to regulate, to make improvements in, or govern any other street in said city.

Mr. DAVEY. There is an amendment to the bill, which I also ask to have read.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Insert, after the words "ninety-nine," in line 9, the following:

"Provided, That in case the said city of New Orleans has granted, or shall grant, a right of way over said street to any railway company, corporation, firm, or person, or that said street shall be used for railway purposes, such grant, privilege, or use shall be upon condition that no part of said street within the limits of said marine-hospital property (or within 1,000 feet from the same) shall be used for depot purposes, or railroad yard, or for the purpose of switching, shifting, or parking cars, or making up or breaking up trains of cars, or for any other purpose than the ordinary transit, without stopping, of railway trains: And provided further, That the inner line of said Front street shall not be located at any point nearer than 8 feet to the present iron fence inclosing the grounds of said marine-hospital property, and the violation of any of the provisions of this act shall, as to the person, company, railway company, municipal corporation, or other corporation so violating any of said provisions, cause a revocation of all rights and privileges given or granted by this act."

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have some explanation of the bill.

Mr. DAVEY. Mr. Speaker, the letter which I hold in my hand I think will afford a full explanation of the bill, and I ask to have it read from the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Washington, January 30, 1900.

SIR: Replying to your letter of the 29th instant, transmitting a copy of House bill No. 284 and requesting suggestions as to its merits and the propriety of its passage, I have to say that, understanding the bill to be a necessity of commerce and that the levee provided for is essential for the safety of the city of New Orleans, this Department regards it favorably with the following proviso, which is necessary for the protection of the United States marine-hospital reservation:

"Provided, That in case the said city of New Orleans has granted, or shall grant, a right of way over said street to any railway company, corporation, firm, or person, or that said street shall be used for railway purposes, such grant, privilege, or use shall be upon condition that no part of said street within the limits of said marine-hospital property (or within 1,000 feet from the same) shall be used for depot purposes, or railroad yard, or for the purpose of switching, shifting, or parking cars, or making up or breaking up trains of cars, or for any other purpose than the ordinary transit, without stopping, of railway trains: And provided further, That the inner line of said Front street shall not be located at any point nearer than 8 feet to the present iron fence inclosing the grounds of said marine-hospital property, and the violation of any of the provisions of this act shall, as to the person, company, railway company, municipal corporation, or other corporation so violating any of said provisions cause a revocation of all rights and privileges given or granted by this act."

Respectfully,

L. J. GAGE,
Secretary.

CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE,
House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BURTON. Before consent is given, I would like to ask the gentleman from Louisiana a question.

Mr. DAVEY. I shall be very glad to answer the gentleman.

Mr. BURTON. Does the bill contemplate any interference with the navigable channel of the river as it now exists?

Mr. DAVEY. None whatever.

Mr. BURTON. This, I understand, refers to the marine-hospital property in Louisiana, on the Mississippi River?

Mr. DAVEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURTON. And does it not authorize the removal of the present or existing line of the levee farther out along the line of the river?

Mr. DAVEY. It authorizes the change from the present location outwardly in the direction of the river to the new line of the levee, established quite recently, but it makes no change as far as the navigable water is concerned.

Mr. BURTON. And leaves the Government still in control of the water front?

Mr. DAVEY. Yes; and only authorizes the extension of the front outwardly in the direction of the river as the levee has been built up.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The amendment recommended by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce was considered, and agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DAVEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

AMENDMENT TO SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6063) to amend chapter 2 of the laws passed by the first session of the Fifty-fifth Congress of the United States, being an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, and for other purposes," approved June 4, 1897.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That chapter 2 of the laws of the first session of the Fifty-fifth Congress, being an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, and for other purposes," approved June 4, 1897, be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the following words where the same appear in said act, commencing with the word "Before," in line 36, on page 35 of volume 30 of the United States Statutes at Large, and ending with the word "exists," in the forty-third line of said volume and page, as follows: "Before such sale shall take place notice thereof shall be given by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, for not less than sixty days, by publication in a newspaper of general circulation published in the county in which the timber is situated, if any is therein published, and if not, then in a newspaper of general circulation published nearest to the reservation, and also in a newspaper of general circulation published at the capital of the State or Territory where such reservation exists," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Before such sale shall take place notice thereof shall be given by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, for not less than thirty days, by publication in one or more newspapers of general circulation, as he may deem necessary, in the State or Territory where such reservation exists."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, before consent is given, I should like some explanation of this bill.

Mr. GAMBLE. I would state, in reply to the gentleman's suggestion, that the grown and matured timber, as well as that which is dead and fallen, under the laws of forest reservations may be sold under authority of the Secretary of the Interior; but before any such sale can be made notice must be given by advertisement. Under the law of 1897 no sale of this character of timber can be made without advertising for sixty days, and allows no discretion whatever to the Commissioner of the General Land Office or to the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. The sale of what?

Mr. GAMBLE. I am speaking of dead and matured timber on forest reservations. At present the law provides that down, grown, and matured timber, as well as the dead timber, can only be sold by the Secretary of the Interior after sixty days' advertisement has been made, and permits no discretion whatever to the Interior Department.

The necessities of the case are so great and the inadequacy of the existing law so apparent that the Commissioner of the General Land Office in his annual report for 1899 recommended the amendment to the law. After conference with him the bill was introduced and is in the exact words proposed by him and approved by the Secretary of the Interior. It was brought before the Committee on Public Lands and considered by that committee, and in its judgment so great a discretion as the bill proposed should not be lodged in the Department, but the committee believed the original law should be modified and amended in the line proposed.

After further conference with the Department an additional modification was recommended, and the amendment now proposed to this bill was drawn by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. It is offered in his exact language. It is approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. LOUD. Does not this amendment propose to remove the restriction of advertising as provided under the existing law?

Mr. GAMBLE. No, sir. It only reduces the time from sixty to thirty days. It also allows the Secretary of the Interior to sell without advertisement matured and down timber for the use of miners, and for cord wood, when the value does not exceed $100. The necessity for the amendment is that frequently on account of delay and the length of time now provided for advertisement no bids are received, and the Government is put to an expense of not less than $50 in the way of advertising, and in addition to this the time of employees necessarily taken in the examination of the timber proposed to be sold.

Under the amendment proposed the Government is entirely protected, because advertisement must be made; but the sale may be concluded by the party agreeing to pay the full amount bid at the time of the sale. This provision will tend to expedite proceedings. No sale can be made unless on application forwarded to the Department here and subjected to proper examination. Under the present system long delays frequently occur.

I repeat, that under this provision the Government is fully protected, and there is great necessity for the proposed modification of the statute. As I have said, it is strongly recommended by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, as well as by the Secretary of the Interior, and is unanimously reported by the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. RIDGELY. Does this bill apply alike to all parts of the United States?

Mr. GAMBLE. Yes, sir; it is a general bill.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I dislike to do what may appear to be brutal in a matter of this kind; but I want to say that if I could have prevented the passage of the original bill, I should have done so, and I now feel obliged to do what I can to prevent the passage of this amendment.

Mr. PACKER of Pennsylvania. I wish to ask the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE] whether it does not oftentimes happen that under the phrase "dead and down timber" large amounts of live timber are cut and in this way the Government defrauded?

Mr. GAMBLE. That, possibly, has sometimes been the case, but not under this law. I have heard of no such complaint as applied to the forest reservations.

Mr. PACKER of Pennsylvania. It is provided in this case, as I understand, that the value of the timber cut shall not exceed $100?

Mr. GAMBLE. Yes, sir; and if live timber is sold there must be advertisement. A sale may be concluded by the purchaser giving bond, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, to pay the highest amount bid at the sale, so that the Government will be protected, and in this way delay may be saved.

Mr. Speaker, if there is any question about the merits of this bill, I will ask for the reading of the report, which presents the reason and the justification for this proposed modification of the law and shows it is strongly recommended by the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior. Legislation of this kind is a great necessity in the forest reserve in my State. I again assure the House that under the provisions of this amendment the Government will be amply protected. There is great demand from the people residing in the Black Hills forest reserve in my State for the proposed legislation, and I sincerely trust no objection will be made to its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LOUD. Most surely. If I could kill the whole law I would do so, and certainly I am not disposed to enlarge its provisions. In my judgment it is one of the most vicious laws that was ever passed.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

BRIDGE ACROSS RED RIVER AT GRAND ECORE, LA.

Mr. BREAZEALE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The bill (H. R. 4473) to authorize the Natchitoches Railway and Construction Company to build and maintain a railway and traffic bridge across Red River at Grand Ecore, in the parish of Natchitoches, State of Louisiana, was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. DALZELL. Is the bill reported by the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee?

Mr. BREAZEALE. Unanimously.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, and agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BREAZEALE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CUBAN VESSELS.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. By direction of the Committee on Insular Affairs, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The bill (S. 734) relating to Cuban vessels was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That vessels owned by citizens of Cuba and documented as such by officers of the United States shall hereafter be entitled in ports of the United States to the rights and privileges of vessels of the most favored nation, and they and their cargoes shall be subject to no higher charges in ports of the United States than are imposed on the vessels and cargoes of the most favored nation in the same trade.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to refund, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, upon application and satisfactory evidence, tonnage taxes and light dues which have been imposed on vessels owned by citizens of Cuba entering ports of the United States since April 11, 1899, which have been in excess of the tonnage taxes prescribed by section 11 of the act of June 19, 1886.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, is this a request for unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. HOPKINS. Then I desire to reserve an objection for the present. I will state to my friend from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] that in my judgment this is a matter of too much importance to be brought up on a proposition for unanimous consent. It involves a constitutional question upon which there may be a division of opinion.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. If the gentleman will permit, I will make a statement.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will reserve the point of order and let the gentleman make an explanation to the Chair and to the House.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The object of this bill is to put Cuban vessels upon the footing of the vessels of other countries with which we have commercial relations.

Under our navigation laws certain taxes are imposed upon foreign vessels. One section imposes a tonnage tax of 50 cents per ton, and another a tax, called light money, of 50 cents per ton, aggregating $1 per ton. Our commerce is carried on almost exclusively under the terms of treaties that have been negotiated, by which those impositions are removed, and no commercial country on the face of the earth that has any regular trade relations with the United States is required to pay this tonnage tax and the light money, amounting to a dollar a ton.

The Spanish Government is exempt from that tax, and these Cuban vessels, as long as they floated the Spanish colors, were entitled to admission into our ports without being required to pay the tax. At the close of the Spanish war the citizens of the island of Cuba owning the vessels preferred not to operate or navigate them under the Spanish colors. They chose not to transfer them to any other foreign nation, in order that they might obtain the benefit of commercial treaties negotiated by this country.

Mr. HOPKINS. If the gentleman will allow me right there: Cuba at the present time is under a military government. If there is any inequality or any injustice being done them, what is the reason that it can not be remedied by an Executive order?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will come to that.

Mr. HOPKINS. Can it be done in that way?

Mr. PAYNE. No, it can not.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It can not be done in that way, and that is the reason and the necessity for this legislation. The Cuban vessel owners determined to navigate their crafts under the colors or the flag of their own country, but it was determined under the treaty of peace that the island of Cuba had no flag that had any international significance, and on the 16th day of last June the President issued an order authorizing Cuban vessels to hoist the Cuban flag as a distinctive signal, to distinguish Cuban vessels from United States vessels, above which they were to float the American colors, in deference to the peculiar limited control that this country had over the affairs of the island; but in the order the President expressly stated that those boats should be subject to the taxes imposed by sections 4219 and 4225, the tonnage duty of 50 cents and the light money of 50 cents a ton. The President took the position that he could only modify the navigation laws and permit vessels of foreign countries to enter our ports by a treaty, and that Cuba had no such status among the nations of the world as gave her the capacity to negotiate a treaty, and, therefore, the President took the position that he was powerless to relieve the vessel owners of that island from this exorbitant tax.

By the terms of the treaty of Paris this country became a party to an arrangement which disabled Cuba from availing herself of the privilege that is and has been for years extended to all commercial countries, even Cuba, and the object of this bill is to accomplish that which the Executive determined that the Government is unable to accomplish by treaty, because there is no power competent to negotiate on the other side.

Now, the Senate bill was passed as if there were but one section, putting Cuban vessels upon the footing of vessels that enjoy the privileges of the most favored nation clause. The bill as introduced in the Senate contained the section that we put upon it as an amendment, but it was stricken out, and the Senate treated the measure as if it originally contained but the one section. The Committee on Insular Affairs, on investigating the subject, concluded that the Cuban vessels had been unjustly required to pay this extra tax. They never had been required to pay it before. As I said a few moments ago, no other country that enjoys regular trade relations with this Government is required to pay it.

Mr. HOPKINS. One moment. As I understand it, then, this bill gives those flying the Cuban flag sovereign rights the same as any other great power.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. No; the bill gives those vessels flying the Cuban flag as a distinctive signal under the Stars and Stripes the same privileges in our ports in respect to all matters of taxation as vessels flying the Spanish flag, the English flag, the German, French, and Italian flags, and the flags of all commercial countries; that is all.

Mr. DALZELL. You put Cuba back into the privileged position that she occupied while a colony of Spain.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That and nothing more. We put Cuba back into the position that she occupied before the treaty of Paris.

Mr. HOPKINS. Does it affect the relation of Cuba and this country in any other respect than the one of which you have spoken?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It does not affect the relations of Cuba with this country in any respect except this one.

Mr. HOPKINS. It does not carry to that island the custom laws or the internal-revenue laws, or the control of the government now existing there under Executive order.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. In no respect whatever; and this bill was prepared by the Commissioner of Navigation, and in our report we submit a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury asking that the bill be passed, and that the second section be put in so that the money that has been collected from the owners of these small crafts shall be refunded now.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Let me ask the gentleman how much does it involve to return the money to those parties?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Approximately about $18,000. On the first day of this year the amount was $15,719, according to the official statement made by the Commissioner of Navigation. It was suggested that the Senate may have stricken out the second section of the bill, because the vessel owners might have imposed higher rates of freight and thus recouped themselves; but the Commissioner of Navigation made the statement to our committee that the first entries, at least, were made without knowledge of this requirement and that the Government had some controversy with the vessel owners in respect to it; but I think, Mr. Speaker, gentlemen will readily see that by the imposition of this extraordinary taxation the discriminations against these small Cuban crafts were such that the money that we propose to reimburse them with will be but a small equivalent for the loss of trade that they must have sustained on account of the imposition of the tax.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Who own these boats?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Citizens of Cuba; and they must be and they are documented by Cuban authority.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOPKINS. I object for the present, until I have further time to consider the bill.

Mr. PAYNE. I hope the gentleman will not object. This bill was fully considered by the Committee on Insular Affairs, and it is unanimously reported.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. There is a pressing necessity for its passage. Boats are coming in every day or two, and it hampers Cuban trade.

Mr. HOPKINS. All I care is, I am not willing that any legislation of this kind shall come in that will affect whatever may be done by the Government of the United States respecting the island of Cuba hereafter.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think the gentleman can be assured that this in no way complicates the situation or embarrasses the Government in its relation with Cuba. It does not involve any question except the one I have mentioned, and it would be entirely just and proper for this Government to pass this bill. If Cuba were a foreign power, the necessity would not exist, because the right would be in the Executive to accomplish by treaty what we are now hoping to do by legislation.

Mr. HOPKINS. I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the Senate bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAYTON of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say for the benefit of gentlemen upon this side of the Chamber that this measure came from the Committee on Insular Affairs by the unanimous report of that committee. I think that it is a meritorious proposition, and that it should pass now. I desire in this connection to call attention to the fact that this emphasizes the importance of the United States recognizing the independence of the Cuban people. This is but a forerunner of the piecemeal legislation that Congress will be called upon from time to time to deal out in our intercourse with the Cuban people and with reference to their affairs. This measure is rendered necessary because of the fact that Cuba has not yet been admitted to the family of nations. It can not fly a flag; it can not make a commercial treaty.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Let me make an inquiry. I supposed, under the custom of the House, that I of course had the floor; and I would like to ask the gentleman how much time he desires?

Mr. CLAYTON of Alabama. I think I have an hour under the rule; but I will say for the gentleman's peace of mind that I do not intend to make a very long speech.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Of course I have no objection to the gentleman discussing the question for a reasonable length of time; but I wanted to understand the situation.

Mr. CLAYTON of Alabama. In my own right, I will consume as much time as I think necessary. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Indiana that the action was going on with the Senate bill; the amendment was agreed to; the gentleman from Indiana did not claim the floor; the gentleman from Alabama did, and controls an hour under the rules, as the Chair understands it. The gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. CLAYTON of Alabama. I think I have a legal advantage, fairly gained, and I intend to assert it. [Laughter and applause.] The necessity for this legislation comes from the fact that we have not done our duty by the Cuban people. This great Government has not lived up to the declared purpose of driving the Spaniards out of Cuba and leaving the government of that island to its own people contained in the resolution that passed Congress in April, 1898. If we had lived up to that, perhaps this question would not be before Congress now, and the other questions of which this is but a mere forerunner would not have to be met by the membership of this House.

Mr. Speaker, if this Government had acted honestly, fairly, squarely, and promptly, as the facts of the case justify, in dealing with the people of Cuba, we would not have such legislation as this here to-day. If the Cuban people were recognized as an independent government, they could negotiate their own commercial treaties, and they would come under the benefits extended to the favored nations of the world. As it is, we are acting as a guardian for Cuba and her people, and we are not treating the ward fairly and justly. It is proposed in this half-handed, piecemeal way to meet what we, under the solemn obligation and purpose that we have declared to the world, we would meet in another way.

Mr. Speaker, no man, I believe, can read the report of General Brooke in regard to the affairs in Cuba but what he will be satisfied that the time is ripe for the American Government to recognize the Cuban people as entitled to independent sovereignty. They are, according to that report, according to the report of General Lee, General Ludlow, and others, whose reports are embraced in General Brooke's report, and especially the report of General Wilson, a law-abiding, peaceful people, intelligent and capable of self-government. He pronounced the highest praise upon the municipal governments that exist throughout that island, and in that report you will also find that we need not wait until the 30th day of November next for dealing with these Cuban questions, for it is stated in that report that the census now being taken there can be completed in two or three months.

Mr. Speaker, I have no prepared speech on this proposition. I merely desire to call the attention of this House to what is to follow in the wake of this piece of legislation. I desire to call attention to the fact that the time is ripe for us to deal with the Cuban question, and this measure, which is a just measure, merely illustrates the fact that we ought to do the full measure of justice to the Cuban people by recognizing them and admitting them into the family of nations. This can be done if this Congress and the Administration will but say the word. The Cuban people will go to work and set up their own government in Cuba, and when they have set up their government there it will simply remain for this Government to recognize it, and it will then be admitted into the family of nations.

I hope this measure will pass, and I hope at an early day the Administration and the majority in this House will live up to our purposes heretofore declared and give to the Cuban people their own government; and if, in the fullness of time, annexation comes, let it come at the request of the Cuban people. Let us strike from them the fetters of military government; let them set up their own government, and, if they please, let them in their own good time ask for annexation in the regular way. Then, Mr. Speaker, the country and Congress will be prepared to deal with that question when so presented; but let us not by piecemeal legislation deal out a small measure of justice to them and hold them in a sort of subjection, and maybe make them submit to forcible annexation.

Mr. Speaker, I hope this measure will pass. I reserve the balance of my time.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and being read the third time, was passed.

On motion of Mr. CRUMPACKER, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

TO AMEND SECTION 1176 OF THE REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have reprinted and a correction made of House Report No. 87, which accompanies the bill H. R. 911. Matter was inserted in the report that had no business there.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks to have stricken from the Report No. 87, on House bill 911, a portion of the report beginning with the words "There are a class of pensioners," as it was erroneously included in the report. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

RIGHT OF WAY THROUGH THE ARSENAL GROUNDS, PITTSBURG, PA.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 7660) granting additional right of way to the Allegheny Valley Railway Company through the arsenal grounds at Pittsburg, Pa.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Allegheny Valley Railway Company be, and it is hereby, authorized to extend its tracks over and occupy all that portion of the Allegheny Arsenal property in the city of Pittsburg, Pa., which adjoins the present right of way of said Allegheny Railway, bounded and described as follows, to wit: All that lot or piece of ground situate in the Fifteenth ward, city of Pittsburg and State of Pennsylvania, bounded and described as follows, to wit: Beginning at a point on the south building line of Fortieth street at a distance of 10.58 feet from the center line of the north-bound track of the Allegheny Valley Railway; thence along the western wall of the United States arsenal south 12° 35′ west 576.70 feet to a point on the north building line of Thirty-ninth street, said point being distant 13.27 feet (measured along the north building line of Thirty-ninth street) from the center of the said north-bound track of the Allegheny Valley Railway; thence south 53° 52′ west 11.22 feet along the north building line of Thirty-ninth street to a point; thence north 12° 21′ east 575.62 feet to a point on the south building line of Fortieth street; thence north 53° 52′ west 13.9 feet to the place of beginning, containing 7,655 square feet: Provided, That the value of said property shall be fixed by a competent board of officers to be appointed by the Secretary of War, which value shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States before the occupation by said company of said strip: And provided further, That the stone boundary wall on the Allegheny River front of the Allegheny Arsenal, which must be removed to permit the desired extension of the railway, be replaced, or its equivalent, on the new boundary line: And provided further, That the said Allegheny Valley Railway Company shall construct for the use of the Government a siding about 777 feet long through the said arsenal property, said siding paralleling the said strip of ground hereinbefore described, all free of cost to the United States in addition to the price paid for the said property.

With the following amendments recommended by the committee:

Strike out all after the words "to wit," in line 8, page 1, down to and including the words "to wit," in line 10, page 1.

Insert, after the word "line," in line 1, page 3, the following: "all free of cost to the United States, and to be approved by the Secretary of War."

Insert, after the word "Government," in line 3, page 3, the following: "on the approval of the Secretary of War."

Strike out the word "seven," in line 3, page 3, and insert in lieu thereof the word "five."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, it was almost impossible to hear the bill read so that we could tell what was in it. I gather that it makes a contribution of the land at Pittsburg to this railway company.

Mr. DALZELL. I will explain it in a moment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will suspend a moment. The House will be in order, and gentlemen will take their seats and cease conversation.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I was about to ask whether this is the report of any committee.

Mr. DALZELL. The bill has been reported unanimously by the Committee on Military Affairs. It was introduced at the suggestion of the War Department. The Allegheny Valley Railroad Company occupies a strip of ground between the Allegheny Arsenal, in the city of Pittsburg, on the one side and the Allegheny River on the other. This is a proposition to sell to the Allegheny Valley Railroad Company an additional right of way over the arsenal property. The value of the property sold is to be appraised by a board appointed by the War Department, and the money is to be paid before occupation by the company is permitted. In addition to that the railroad company is to provide for the Government a siding extending throughout the entire length of the property. There is no cost involved to the Government; on the contrary, the Government is to receive the full value of the land parted with. As I said at the outstart, the bill originated in a suggestion from the War Department.

Mr. CANNON. If this right of way be obtained by the railway company, will there be left sufficient ground for all possible arsenal purposes hereafter?

Mr. DALZELL. There will remain probably 15 or 20 acres. The ground now proposed to be sold is a mere strip 12 feet wide taken off one end of the arsenal property.

Mr. RAY of New York. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] whether the right of way proposed to be given to this railway company divides the arsenal grounds into two portions?

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, no, not at all; it simply takes off a little strip.

Mr. RIDGELY. Reserving the right to object, I would like some further explanation. Is this to be an absolute grant by the Government without any power of recall or revocation hereafter?

Mr. DALZELL. I think so.

Mr. RIDGELY. Would the gentleman object to an amendment leaving to the Government the option of reclaiming this property at any time when it may desire to use it?

Mr. DALZELL. Why, sir, this is to be a purchase; the railway company pays the money, the amount paid to be fixed by a board appointed by the Secretary of War. It is to be a conveyance for a consideration.

Mr. RIDGELY. Has the measure received the approval of the Secretary of War?

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly. As I stated at the outstart, the bill was introduced at the instance of the War Department; it was prepared pursuant to a communication from the Secretary of War to the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. RIDGELY. How many acres will be disposed of in this way?

Mr. DALZELL. A strip of land 577 feet long by 12 feet wide—about one-sixth of an acre.

Mr. HULL. May I be allowed a word of explanation? This railroad company now has a right of way through these grounds. The first right of way was granted in 1853, and an additional strip in 1874. The Department states that the facilities there at present are not sufficient to enable the Government to promptly receive and discharge the freight that it receives or sends out at this arsenal.

Mr. RIDGELY. One other question. I understood the gentleman to say that "we pay for the land." Whom does the gentleman mean?

Mr. DALZELL. The railroad company pays.

Mr. RIDGELY. Does this bill reserve to the Government the use of this track? Is the track to be a switch, or a part of the main line of the road?

Mr. DALZELL. The company is to build for the Government an independent track through the entire length of this strip.

Mr. RIDGELY. And the Government is to have the independent use of that track for all time without charge?

Mr. DALZELL. Yes, sir; absolutely.

Mr. McCLEARY. From what has been said I understand that this is for the benefit of the Government rather than the railroad company.

Mr. DALZELL. The matter was so put by the Secretary of War in his communication.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the House proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendments reported by the committee were agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DALZELL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ELECTION OF SENATORS.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Speaker, at the time that the Committee on the Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress filed their report on House joint resolution No. 28 it was not understood by the chairman that some members of the committee desired to file a minority report. I now ask unanimous consent that such members of the committee as may desire to do so have until next Wednesday to file their dissenting views upon the joint resolution.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Let us hear the title of the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing for the election of Senators of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] asks unanimous consent that members of the Committee on the Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress be allowed until Wednesday next to file a minority report upon House resolution No. 28. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and leave was accordingly granted.

CUBA—CIVIL REPORTS OF MAJ. GEN. JOHN R. BROOKE.

Mr. HEATWOLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the concurrent resolution that I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 7,000 copies of so much of the civil report of Maj. Gen. John R. Brooke, military governor of the island of Cuba, made to the Adjutant-General of the United States Army, with accompanying papers and documents, as is in the English language, together with a prepared index, of which 2,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 4,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,000 copies for the use of the War Department.

The Committee on Printing recommend the adoption of the following amendment: Strike out the word "report," in the third line of the resolution, and insert the word "reports."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution?

There was no objection.

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HEATWOLE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ADDITIONAL STENOGRAPHER FOR COMMITTEES.

Mr. JOY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a privileged report and ask its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That an additional official stenographer to committees of the House is hereby authorized, who shall be appointed by and be under the direction of the Speaker, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House at the rate of $5,000 per year until otherwise provided for.

Mr. BULL, from the Committee on Accounts, submitted the following report, to accompany resolution No. 114:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred resolution No. 114, providing for the appointment by the Speaker of an additional official stenographer to committees of the House, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, at the rate of $5,000 per year, until otherwise provided for, have had the same under consideration and beg leave to report as follows:

At present two official stenographers to committees of the House are employed, at an annual salary of $5,000 each. They are required to report hearings before the regular and special committees, and to perform such other stenographic work as may be required by committees. During the present session of Congress the demand upon the two stenographers by committees has been greater than usual, and at many times so great that the calls could not be answered, necessitating the employment of outside help at large expense. On many days six committees required the services of two stenographers. These were the Committees on Appropriations and subcommittees, Naval Affairs, Post-Office and Post-Roads, Coinage, Weights, and Measures, Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and the Special Committee on the Roberts Case. It is becoming more and more the custom to report the proceedings of committees, as it has been found that the testimony then taken has proved of great value in subsequent proceedings, especially upon questions involving appropriations of money.

To meet the requirements of all committees demanding such service is a great physical and mental strain upon two stenographers, the proceedings being technical and informal, and the "takes," or the time each man is continually taking shorthand notes, being often five hours long without relief. To transcribe the notes requires additional labor and necessitates the stenographers to remain on duty until midnight in order to keep up with the work.

It is obvious to your committee that an additional stenographer is absolutely necessary. We therefore recommend the adoption of the accompanying resolution. The salary is fixed at the same rate now paid the regular force, $5,000, for the reason that we believe the character of the work to be performed calls for an expert stenographer.

Mr. JOY. Mr. Speaker, in reference to the resolution just read, I will say that this comes from the Committee on Accounts by unanimous report. Provision is made in the resolution for proper assistance and attendance on the committees of the House where testimony must be taken. At present it is impossible to provide for that with the limited force at the disposal of the House. This provides for the appointment of an additional stenographer for the committees, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But, if the gentleman will permit me, there is no limitation, as I understand the reading of the report, upon the length of the employment or how long he shall be paid for.

Mr. JOY. The matter is placed in the discretion of the House. He is to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House for this service.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then it is contemplated that he shall be kept during the entire session of Congress?

Mr. JOY. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Would that be necessary? The work may not last but for a very brief time.

Mr. JOY. The report, I will state to the gentleman, is unanimous. We have considered this matter very carefully and find it necessary to adopt the resolution as the committee has provided.

Mr. BARTLETT. I would like to say to the gentleman from Tennessee that the Committee on Accounts came to the conclusion, after very careful investigation of the matter, and of the work which was before the various committees of the House, after listening to members of the House as to the hearings before their various committees, that it was impossible to perform the duties with the existing force, and that an additional stenographer was absolutely required.

The stenographic force of the House as it now exists is not able, as we all are well aware, to comply with the demands of the various committees for assistance in their hearings from time to time. Of course, when these gentlemen are not employed in other committees they are available for the committees which desire to have hearings. But in a session of Congress, especially at the beginning, there is a great demand on their time and attention. They are employed almost without intermission, and the hearings embrace, as gentlemen must be aware, many great and important questions which are important in the legislation that Congress is expected to undertake. Both the majority and the minority of the committee, after an investigation of the matter, have concluded that this request is only a reasonable one and should be allowed; and it is only after a careful investigation in connection with the whole matter that we found it absolutely desirable and, in our judgment, necessary to give this additional help.

Representing the committee—or the minority of the committee, at least in part—I voted, after a full investigation, for the adoption of the resolution, and think it ought now to be passed.

Mr. HITT. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill a question. By what regulations are the stenographers now governed? Are they subject to the call of any chairman of a committee who desires to have testimony taken before the committee?

Mr. JOY. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that if they are not otherwise engaged they are subject to the call of any committee that desires or needs their services. It is impossible, however, for them sometimes to attend to the demands of committees which really need their services.

These men are appointed by the Speaker and their duties are clearly fixed. They are always at hand when their services are needed, and the only trouble is that the committees—many in number—requiring their services can not secure them when they are often absolutely necessary.

Mr. HITT. By what regulation is that determined, and where is it to be found?

Mr. JOY. I do not think there is any law with reference to it. They are under the direction of the Speaker of the House. They are appointed by the Speaker and are ordered to appear before committees, when called upon by the chairmen of committees, to report hearings.

Mr. RICHARDSON. There is no law. You have to file your application and get them as best you can. That is the rule.

Mr. HITT. The employment of these officers, then, is limited to the three persons? They are not required to have anybody else to assist them, and when they are not called for their salaries run on?

Mr. JOY. The salaries run on.

Mr. HITT. Well, under the authority of the Speaker, these officers being salaried continuously, could there be an arrangement made by which the current work of committees could be attended to without a chairman having to go and procure a stenographer himself, as has been done repeatedly?

Mr. JOY. That has been done for the simple reason that it was impossible for the two committee stenographers to meet the requirements of the different committees. It has been the practice for many years to have two or more committee stenographers. There are only two now. They sit at a committee meeting and report the proceedings of the committee for perhaps three hours. They then have to write them all up and have the report ready for the next meeting of the committee. These stenographers are therefore busy night and day, and it is impossible after the shorthand notes are taken to get them transcribed into longhand for the use of the committee sometimes for a week or two after the hearing was had, and it has become——

Mr. HITT. I was simply calling attention to the singular inaptitude of the method proposed, of having a man salaried by the year to do a kind of work that comes now and then, with a glut perhaps for four days, but no provision made by which two or three persons, who are employed only a fourth of the time, could have an abundant force to dispose of that work as it arises

Mr. JOY. That would have to be done by a law and not by a resolution.

Mr. HITT. My question was whether there was any regulation or usage that determined that, so as to give a discretion to enable these men to have assistants to dispose of the work rapidly when it comes instead of being compelled to put in a $5,000 officer here, when we may not have this pressure for more than a week at a time.

Mr. STEELE. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. JOY. I do.

Mr. STEELE. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs if he has ever made a call on the Speaker for an official stenographer or sent his clerk to the Speaker for an official stenographer when there was one not employed that he did not get him?

Mr. HITT. I can not say that that ever happened.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. JOY. I do.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I would like to ask whether or not the stenographer who will be employed will receive any additional compensation for transcribing the testimony that is taken before the committees?

Mr. JOY. Not at all.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is all included in the $5,000 salary?

Mr. JOY. That is included in the salary of the stenographer.

Mr. SHAFROTH. He is not authorized to have his assistants paid out of the Treasury?

Mr. JOY. There is no provision for any assistants.

Mr. HEPBURN. Now I should like to ask a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. JOY. I do.

Mr. HEPBURN. I simply desire to make this inquiry of the gentleman: Would it not be better to provide for the employment of two stenographers at a per diem equal to that which you will pay to the officer proposed to be employed? I know there is very great difficulty in securing adequate service at these various committee hearings. I know that in my own committee we have had to wait, sometimes very impatiently, because we could not secure a stenographer to report the hearings. The quantity of the work is so great that the two who are now authorized are entirely unable to handle it. The gentleman must remember that in this Congress the demand upon the stenographers is very much greater than ever before. There are so many new questions that are receiving attention. There are so many witnesses whose testimony we desire to preserve that I do not believe three stenographers for the reporting of the committees alone will be able to meet the demand during this Congress.

Mr. BARTLETT. Do you mean three additional?

Mr. HEPBURN. No; I mean the two already employed with the one additional, and I was asking the gentleman if he would not prefer to have two stenographers instead of one, to be paid a per diem compensation.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield to me for a moment? I want to say in reply to the gentleman from Iowa that so far as I am concerned, I was guided in voting for this resolution by a desire to meet the demands of the great committees of the House, which are investigating questions which require the services of official stenographers, and I am perfectly willing, as far as I am individually concerned, to be guided by the reasonable wishes of those committees. And if the chairmen of these various committees believe that two stenographers at a per diem are necessary for the proper conduct of the business before those committees, in order to preserve a record of the hearings, I for one am perfectly willing to accede to that request and grant it to them.

Mr. HEPBURN. I did not desire to criticise the committee. I think their proposition is in the right direction, only I feared it was not enough. I know there is great difficulty in getting stenographers to report these committee hearings under the present arrangement.

Mr. JOY. I will answer what has been said by saying we have proceeded on the same lines that have always been followed in these matters. There is no law that provides for an additional stenographer. If a law is passed, it might be much better to provide for two additional stenographers during the session of Congress, at a per diem payment; but in order that all should stand upon the same basis, we provided for this additional one to be appointed and paid in the same way and the same salary that the others are paid, to meet the demands of the committees as represented to us by their chairmen.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

S. D. NEWCOMB.

Mr. JOY. I also present another resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and is hereby, directed to pay S. D. Newcomb, the document and bill clerk of the House, as authorized by resolution No. 141, passed March 3, 1899, his salary as such, from the contingent fund of the House, from the 1st day of July, 1899, and until said salary is provided for in the annual legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. JOY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that this is the same person who has heretofore been employed. His assistance is absolutely necessary, and it is hoped that he will be provided for in the general bill by the proper committee, so that he may always hold that position, or some one may always hold that position. The resolution as introduced provided that he should be provided for from July, but we have amended that so as to be from the 1st of November.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the Committee on Accounts had several resolutions referred to it at the beginning of this session for extra clerks to committees. I want to say that the Committee on Military Affairs has had to employ an extra clerk, as has been done for the past twenty years, and so far in this session the chairman of the committee has had to bear that expense. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Accounts if it is intended to give to those committees really needing it the extra force or not? For, if not, I want to relieve the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs from any further liability for the service of that committee to meet the demands of the members of the House. It will not be long until the House will demand the employment of an extra clerk.

Mr. JOY. I will state, in answer to the gentleman, that the question that he has brought up has received a great deal of consideration in the Committee on Accounts. I believe, speaking for myself and nobody else, that the committee are disposed to grant to every committee such additional clerical force as that committee may need, and no more. The question of discriminating and differentiating between the needs of the committees has been a very difficult one of solution, and the committee has not yet solved it. The chairman of the committee is not present. I am satisfied that the committee, in a very few days or within the next week, will make a report by which the committees will be properly provided with such clerical force as they need.

Mr. BARTLETT. In answer to the gentleman from Iowa, I desire to say that the committee, without divulging anything that ought not to be divulged, has prepared a report to pass a resolution providing for additional clerks. I do not know whether the gentleman is informed about it or not. I will not indicate, but yet I think we are going to provide amply for the committee of the gentleman from Iowa and others that require assistance.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, just one word more. By consent of the gentleman from Missouri, I want to say to the House that out of the first 6,000 bills introduced this session the Committee on Military Affairs had 1,460 of them; and in addition to the large number of these bills that require a great deal of attention we have the appropriation bills. There is an average of twenty to thirty people in the committee room every day asking the status of these bills. And with all that work we have only one clerk. I do not make any reflection upon other committees that have additional help, because I have no doubt they need it. The Committee on Invalid Pensions has two annual clerks and a clerk detailed from the Bureau, and I think they need them.

Mr. BARTLETT. And they are asking another, in the shape of a stenographer.

Mr. HULL. I am not criticising what is given to other committees, but it is absolutely impossible for the Committee on Military Affairs to serve this House unless they have an additional clerk.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT. I want to say this about that.

Mr. JOY. I submit, Mr. Speaker, all this discussion is not germane to the resolution before the House.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to his colleague from Georgia?

Mr. JOY. I think we had better stop the discussion.

Mr. BARTLETT. I will save what I was about to say for another time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amend ment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was adopted.

A. J. MAXHAM.

Mr. JOY. Mr. Speaker, there is one other resolution from the committee on which it desires to make an adverse report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolution No. 86.

Resolved, That A. J. Maxham, of Vermont, be appointed as special messenger to serve in and about the House, under the direction of the Doorkeeper, at a salary of $1,200 per annum, to be paid out of the contingent fund until otherwise provided for.

Mr. JOY. That is adversely reported by the committee.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the report.

The report of the Committee on Accounts was agreed to.

REPORT OF COMMISSION ON AFFAIRS IN PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message of the President; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs. The message was ordered to be printed, the report being already in print:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the information of the Congress a report of a commission appointed by me on January 20, 1900, to investigate affairs in the Philippine Islands.

WILLIAM McKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 2, 1900.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER announced the following change of reference: The bill (S. 6) for the relief of James H. Latham, erroneously referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. CONNELL, for ten days, on account of important business.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts in the chair) for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7433) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a request that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], who was unable to be present yesterday afternoon, be allowed to proceed as in general debate for fifteen minutes. The time had been allotted to him and was not consumed by any other gentleman, and he was unable to be present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas requests unanimous consent that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] be allowed to proceed as in general debate for fifteen minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

[Mr. BARTLETT addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the gentleman from Georgia to-day, touching the subject of lynching, and I listened to his colleague, another gentleman from Georgia, yesterday upon the same subject, and various gentlemen upon that side of the House. I want to say that, coming from Illinois, as I do, I admit that there have been in recent times a number of lynchings. There have been one or two in the last three or four years. Among others, one in the county in which I reside, the only one since its organization, seventy years ago. Now, when I say that, I want to say that no lynching has happened in Illinois that I do not exceedingly regret, and generally when the blood cools in the locality where the lynching takes place, our people regret it and reprobate it. And I trust the same thing is true in the State of Georgia.

Mr. BARTLETT. Certainly it is.

A MEMBER. And all over the South.

Mr. CANNON. My friend says, "All over the South."

The gentleman gave two instances in the State of Georgia. His colleague yesterday gave one instance. The bare recital of those incidents made the blood of every member who heard it hot with indignation.

Sir, I understand that in the State of Georgia and in most of the Southern States that infamous crime, rape, is punishable, upon conviction, by the infliction of the death penalty.

Mr. BARTLETT. In the discretion of the jury.

Mr. CANNON. Now, I believe that in every State of the South, as well as every State of the North, it is quite practicable to get a jury of honest, intelligent people who will give to the accused the benefit of a fair trial, with the privilege of being confronted with the witnesses against him; and while we can not expect, perhaps, in an extreme case that human nature can always forbear to go outside of the law, yet it would be far better if human nature could forbear until the party accused could be brought to the bar of the court and if guilty convicted and if innocent acquitted.

Mr. BARTLETT. Right on that line the gentleman will allow me to say that in my State, in the district represented by Judge MADDOX and the one represented by my colleague, Mr. BRADLEY, and in numbers of other districts in that State, the people have recently shown a disposition when not worked upon by unjust denunciation to assert the majesty of the law and give these people accused of crime a regular trial.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, I believe that the people of the State of Georgia have the capacity, if they will, to enforce the law——

Mr. BARTLETT. We are doing it.

Mr. CANNON. And secure to the humblest citizen a fair trial, whatever bad things people may say about them beyond the boundaries of the State.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would not have said one word but that it seemed to me that the tenor of the remarks of some gentlemen perhaps—I will say I do not believe they were meant in that way—looked toward a justification of lynchings. I have no justification of the violation of law by one individual or by many individuals, and it is necessary that the tone of society should be this way throughout the country if our civilization is to be maintained.

Mr. GRIGGS. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. CANNON. In one moment. Let me say before I sit down there have been lynchings in my own State. I have in my mind now a case which happened in an adjacent county to the one in which I reside, where within the last ten years an outcry was raised against a helpless negro, and in the excitement of that outcry he was taken from the jail in hot blood by white citizens of Illinois and hanged. And the fact was developed afterwards that he was guiltless of the accusation against him. What reparation can there be in cases like this, where innocent men, without trial, without conviction, without hearing, are in hot blood put under the sod?

I am not now seeking to say that the State which I have the honor to represent in part is without fault or to throw stones at others. But I do feel it my duty at this moment to say that all lynchings are unfortunate and that in my judgment nothing ought to be said by myself or anybody else in this National House of Representatives that would be otherwise received by the country than in reprobation of the violation of law, whether by one man or by many. [Loud applause.]

I will now yield to my friend on the other side.

Mr. BARTLETT. I wish to say to my friend——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has expired.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Committee of the Whole will excuse me if I call them back to a consideration of the subject we are supposed to have before us. I do not wish the country to suppose, because so much time has been devoted here to a discussion of certain crimes, that they are crimes to which the Indians resort. The Indians do not resort to the crime of rape or to crimes against the elective franchise.

Mr. Chairman, yesterday, under the head of "Treaties," we passed over informally a provision on page 10 to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] raised objection and for which he asserted there was no treaty provision. I have ascertained, Mr. Chairman, that there is a treaty provision, as I had supposed, but the exact place where it was to be found escaped my memory for the time—a treaty provision for these two items which were passed over by unanimous consent yesterday.

I find by consulting the RECORD of one year ago that the gentleman and I at that time had some discussion, when the Indian appropriation bill was under consideration, in reference to these two items and that his construction and mine differed, the result of the difference being that finally we permitted these items to go out last year. I believe that the gentleman is in error in his construction of the treaty, which is that after a period of thirty years from 1868 (which has now elapsed) there is no longer any obligation on the part of the Government in this matter. But in order that there may be no possibility of error in this respect, I am willing that these two items should go out of the bill for the present. I will then call upon the law officer of the Interior Department for his opinion as to the right of these Indians under the sections of the treaty to which I will call attention; and if his opinion is in accord with that of the gentleman from Illinois, we will drop the subject. If not in accord with his opinion, but rather in accord with mine, I will ask the committee in the Senate to reinsert the item. I will now ask, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that on page 10, lines 16 to 23, inclusive, be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the paragraph which is proposed to be stricken out.

The Clerk read as follows:

APACHES, KIOWAS, AND COMANCHES.

For pay of employees, as provided by treaty of October 21, 1867, $6,000.

CHEYENNES AND ARAPAHOES.

For pay of employees, as provided in treaty of October 28, 1867, $6,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think we read to line 4 on page 36 last evening, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will resume the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Indian Territory: For general incidental expenses of the Indian Service in the Indian Territory, including incidental expenses of the Indian inspector's office and for pay of employees, $13,280.

Mr. CANNON. I want to ask the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs a question. This is a provision for a clerical force, I suspect, for the inspector's office in the Indian Territory, is it not?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; this is not for clerical help. It is for the general incidental expenses of the agents there—that is, traveling expenses in going from one place to another, and in employing in and about the agency such help as is needed, and very often provided for specifically in this and other appropriation bills.

Mr. CANNON. And I suppose it grows out of the anomalous condition in the Indian Territory.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; the same condition exists in almost all States.

Mr. CANNON. And yet there is no special appropriation for this Indian service elsewhere like under this, is there?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; all these items under incidental expenses are alike.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; but is there another instance——

Mr. BROSIUS. Montana is just the same.

Mr. SHERMAN. They are all the same.

Mr. CANNON. I see the gentleman is correct, but this is for $13,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. This is larger, of course, because it is a larger Territory than any particular Indian reservation, and because there are more Indians in the Indian Territory by three times, I think, than are found in any single State, not to say on any single reservation.

Mr. CANNON. There are no agents, I believe, for the Five Civilized Tribes.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is one agent at the Union Agency; but there are other Indians in the Indian Territory not included in the Five Civilized Tribes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries of four commissioners, appointed under acts of Congress approved March 3, 1893, and March 2, 1895, to negotiate with the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, $20,000: Provided, That the number of said commissioners is hereby fixed at four. For expenses of commissioners and necessary expenses of employees, and $3 per diem for expenses of a clerk detailed as special disbursing agent by Interior Department, while on duty with the commission, shall be paid therefrom; for clerical help, including secretary of the commission and interpreters, $276,000; for contingent expenses of the commission, $4,000; in all, $300,000.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. I should like to ask the gentleman from New York in charge of this bill how much was the appropriation made last year under this head?

Mr. SHERMAN. One hundred and twenty-three thousand dollars.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. I should like to ask the gentleman what is the necessity of increasing it about 150 per cent?

Mr. SHERMAN. If the gentleman will send to the document room and get Document No. 220 of this Congress, he will find the estimate supplemental to the original estimate sent us through the Treasury Department, calling for an appropriation of $641,000.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. I should not be surprised at the extent of any appropriation that commission calls for, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, I should be greatly surprised if that commission called for any appropriation that was not entirely proper.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, if I remember correctly, this commission was appointed about seven years ago.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; ten years ago.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. The law was passed, I think, in October, 1893.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the first act was a little earlier than that. I am not sure.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. Well, it may be that it was a little earlier. It has been about seven years since that commission have been at work on the duties assigned to them; and what are those duties, Mr. Chairman? What duties have devolved upon this commission since their appointment seven years ago? To take the enumeration of the Five Civilized Tribes of the Indian Territory preparatory to an allotment of land as soon as that enumeration can be taken. I state to the committee this evening that from the best information I have—and I believe it is correct—the population of the Five Civilized Tribes to-day amounts to about 85,000 people, and, as a mathematical proposition, I should like to submit to the chairman of this committee and to the Committee of the Whole, if it takes these gentlemen, four in number, seven years to fix the status of 85,000 people—and they are not yet through with it—if the same course was pursued with reference to the census of the United States, that census would not be taken in one hundred and fifty years.

I see that this commission have also duties devolving upon them in the way of establishing possible town sites. These four gentlemen, with their traveling paraphernalia, drawing a salary of $5,000 a year each from the public Treasury of this country, traveling over a circumscribed area to take the census of 85,000 people, have been engaged in that service about seven years, and yet this House is confronted with the suggestion and the proposition coming from that committee that we shall increase the appropriation heretofore made to that department about 150 per cent.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BURKE of Texas. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not care much about the bill, but is it not a large part of the duties of that commission, in addition to making the enumeration, to find out who are entitled to have a part of that property down there, depending on questions of heirship, and all that?

Mr. BURKE of Texas. On the question, as I understand it, of Indianship instead of heirship.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, it means the same thing in the end.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. Yes; I concede that that is a part of their duty, and in making that concession, Mr. Chairman, I submit to this House whether it should not be an object of censure that a commission of four men should consume seven years' time in determining the status of 85,000 Indians? And in that connection I submit this further suggestion, whether or not this House ought to yield every point toward increasing the cost of this commission, with their traveling paraphernalia.

Mr. LACEY. The suggestion made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURKE] would be a very natural one if it came from some other locality, some distant State unassociated and unfamiliar with the Indian Territory; but as my friend lives so near there——

Mr. BURKE of Texas. Let me answer that. It comes from "the gentleman from Texas" because I am close by, and I know and have heard enough to satisfy me that there ought to be a remedy somewhere for this thing.

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman then pleads guilty to a situation in which he ought to have knowledge of the affairs of the Indian Territory, and my friend from Texas is always so fair and candid that I am surprised at his attack upon the Dawes Commission.

I want to say in behalf of that commission that no more complex situation ever confronted any body of men in this world than the problem that was laid upon them by the original act creating the commission and the subsequent acts passed from time to time enlarging their powers and imposing upon them additional duties. It was my duty as a member of the joint committee of the House and Senate to help frame what is now known as the Curtis Act. We ran up against almost every conceivable proposition of law.

We found people there who claimed to be members of Indian tribes by marriage, by inheritance, by affinity in the most remote degree. They sought access to tribes, the richest almost in the world, tribes owning large areas of land, tribes which had rights to money deposited in the Treasury, and many white men, some of them even from Texas, were willing to forego the claim of being Texans and to call themselves Choctaw or Cherokee Indians, or anything else, in order to become entitled to the benefit of the rights to which those tribes were entitled.

Now, all these questions had to be solved in some way. When we commenced to draw the Curtis law an effort was made to respect all rights that had theretofore been granted by acts of Congress and all the various rights that had arisen growing out of the peculiar legislation of the Territorial legislatures of the tribes themselves. Also an effort was made to recognize the judicial decisions which have attempted to construe these multiplying and remarkable rights.

Now, the Dawes Commission has grown beyond its original scope. It has become a dignified commission, having the right to settle questions among these Indians in a Territory nearly two-thirds as large as the State of Indiana, and equally as rich and fertile. From 300,000 to 500,000 white people have moved in there. Railroads have crossed the country; town sites have been laid out; and the supreme court of Texas, great court as it is, in that Commonwealth in which it is situated, has had no more difficult problems confronting it in the last five years than the Dawes Commission has been compelled to meet and decide.

That board has been bringing the tribes together, and has been negotiating treaties with those tribes that have been rejected by Congress and then sent back again, remodeled, and afterwards accepted. That commission has been headed by a man whose name is a household word among the Indians. It is known as the "Dawes Commission." The Indians know that there is no more able friend of their race and no more fair and just man can be selected for the purpose of deciding those matters between them than this honorable gentleman, Hon. Henry L. Dawes, who heads that commission, and whose name is attached to that commission.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. I have not the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with the gentleman at all, and doubtless he comes up to the whole measure that the gentleman has stated; but can he tell me how long it is since the chairman of that commission was in the Indian Territory?

Mr. LACEY. I will state——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. I ask that the gentleman's time may be extended five minutes.

Mr. LACEY. I hope my time may be extended. I think this is a question the House ought to understand. It is perhaps the most living question embraced in the Indian bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the time of the gentleman may be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LACEY. Now I yield to the gentleman for his question.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. I wish to state to the gentleman from Iowa I am informed by a reputable lawyer in the Indian Territory, whose name I can give if necessary, that the chairman of that commission has not seen the Indian Territory in over three years.

Mr. LACEY. No doubt of it, sir. Mr. Chairman, Mr. Dawes, the head of that commission, and whose name attaches to it, is known as a tower of strength to that commission in all that Territory. He is one of that commission, and they confer with him. They meet with him. He appeared with them before the Indian Committee. He was present when the Curtis Act was framed, and he has been giving that commission the benefit of his wise counsel and influence all these years. He has become an old man. I suppose he is near 80 years of age.

A MEMBER. Upward.

Mr. LACEY. He is a man that that commission can very illy spare, and his name is still attached to it; but the detail work, the work in the field—the appraisements, the allotments, and the making of these rolls—has been deputed to younger and more vigorous men; but it would be a very grave loss to the commission to be deprived of the wise counsel of Henry L. Dawes, the chairman of the commission. It is true, as my friend says, he is not connected with the field work or the active work of making these various allotments and attending to the details of the duties of that commission out in the wild West where these tribes are located.

Now, Mr. Chairman, more progress has been made in the adjustment of these Indian matters in the last four years than in any previous twenty-five years. That is the unanimous report from everybody along the line so far as I know. Ask the gentlemen upon the Indian Committee whose districts immediately adjoin the Indian Territory, and ask others living out there, and who indirectly represent in a certain sense the Territory in which this commission is operating; and so far as I know the report from them has been of the most gratifying character.

I am satisfied if my friend from Texas would give the same close and careful examination to the question that those gentlemen have done—the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE], the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENTON]—formerly on the committee, who live adjoining the Territory, he would see that this commission is doing better work than has ever been done in the settlement of the Indian question. Now, the request is made for more money to expedite this work, the idea being to close this work out at the earliest possible moment, and the committee cut the estimate in two as made by the Dawes Commission.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to inquire, if you have any information on the subject, about how long will it be before they get through with this work?

Mr. CURTIS. In four years.

Mr. LACEY. I think it will take longer.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I ask that question because we want to take that Territory in as a State.

Mr. LACEY. I know that it is said that it can be done in four years, but they have a very difficult problem there, and, personally, I only give my own view. While the committee think it can be done in four years, I think it will take longer. New difficulties are always arising; new questions arising constantly; and this Dawes Commission, in my judgment, will ultimately be the nucleus of a general government of that Territory, and instead of the commission going out in four years its power will rather be enlarged instead of doing away with the commission itself. It is a wise expenditure of public money in this place, because they are men in whom the Indians have confidence in negotiating and settling up complex questions arising between the different Indian tribes and the white settlers there, and the various claims to Indian citizenship.

Mr. FLYNN. Mr. Chairman, this one fact must be borne in mind, that, as the gentleman from Texas states, they have been in existence a number of years. At the time the commission was created it was composed of five members, and for whom Congress appropriated $5,000 each for salary. They came back repeatedly, year after year, to Congress with the report that the jurisdiction conferred upon them by Congress was not acceptable to the Indians, and year after year Congress sent them back again to see whether or not it was not possible to make agreements with them.

That state of facts existed until two years ago. So that when the statement is made that this commission has existed six or eight years, and that if it takes them that length of time to go ahead and do what small amount of work they have done, how long will it take them to finish it, I am here to say that the commission during the past two years has done more work than they previously accomplished in six years. Why? Simply because when the Indians realized that Congress was in earnest and passed the so-called Curtis Act, the Choctaws and the Chickasaws at once made treaties with this commission. The Creeks and Cherokees made treaties also. Congress ratified the Choctaw and Chickasaw agreement, but did not ratify the Cherokee and the Creek.

I live adjoining where this commission works. If the wish of many members of this House eventually becomes a law, this Indian Territory, over which this commission now exercises its function, will become a part of the State of Oklahoma. I have made personal visits there, and I am here to say now that there was no commission ever created that accomplished as much for the amount of money appropriated as this commission has during the past two years.

Now, another thing that was brought out before the Committee on Indian Affairs. The statement has been made broadcast that all the commission desired was to have their job last so that they can draw their salaries. What are the facts? The recommendation to your Committee on Indian Affairs provided that the appropriation for this year should be $640,000. I asked the commission whether or not that amount could be handled judiciously. I said that I had heard that all that they desired was to continue their places. The original item was $170,000.

The Secretary, after consultation, said that they requested an appropriation of $640,000, but the committee, after going into the facts, decided that an appropriation of $300,000 would doubtless give this commission sufficient funds to put additional corps of surveyors and allotting agents in the field, and so the work could be advanced so much more rapidly.

I am familiar with the situation down there, and God knows I want it to terminate as quickly as possible, but you must realize that you can not measure the amount of work that is to be done by the work that has been done by the commission for the past six years, for the simple reason that Congress was insisting that they should make an agreement with the tribes, and the tribes refused to make agreements.

I was at Muscogee last summer when the commission, acting under the Curtis Act—they did not have a treaty with the Creeks, because Congress refused to ratify it—acting under the Curtis law, opened the land office at the town of Muscogee. I have been at all the booms and rushes that have taken place in the Territory of Oklahoma, but I am here to say that the rush of Indians to this land office opened at Muscogee has never been paralleled in the history of the West.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. I ask that the gentleman have five minutes longer.

There was no objection.

Mr. FLYNN. I was there, I say, when that land office was opened. The Indians have finally come to realize that Congress is in earnest and does not longer intend to allow the existing condition that has prevailed for the last fifty years to continue in the Indian Territory.

Mr. RIDGELY. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. FLYNN. Yes.

Mr. RIDGELY. How long do you think, or in the opinion of the committee, it will take for this commission to do its work?

Mr. FLYNN. Well, the commission testified that if they received the $170,000, it would take them about five years. Then the question was asked them if they got the $640,000 how long it would take them, and, if I recollect correctly, it was stated two or three years.

Mr. SHERMAN. Two years. I have the statement before me.

Mr. FLYNN. Two years. Now, the Committee on Indian Affairs reported with an enlargement of the old appropriation, meeting the desires of the commission halfway, and at the same time allowing an advancement of the work, so that when the commission reports next to Congress they will have concluded not only the making of the rolls, not only the resurvey—and here let me inform the House that the geological survey made in that Territory was not a land-office survey made as we have it in other States. In the States, when a survey is made, the quarter-section lines are all marked out, but in the Indian Territory they are not so marked out, and they found it absolutely necessary to have additional surveys made, if I remember correctly, of about two-thirds of that entire area.

Gentlemen must also remember that up to the time the treaties were made between this commission and the Indians the Indian Territory comprised five independent municipalities, each of which acknowledged allegiance to no man and no power outside themselves. Congress granted them the fee to the land and guaranteed that they should remain forever uninterrupted in their locations, in their customs, laws, and usages not inconsistent with the Constitution. So that when this commission was created it was necessary for it to deal individually and separately with each one of these five tribes.

Each of them had its own constitution and set of laws, its own supreme court, its own house of commons and lords. There was nothing in common between them except an agreement as to citizenship. In other words, the Creeks would have one kind of law, the Cherokees another, the Seminoles another, the Choctaws another, and the Chickasaws another. This commission in dealing with those Indians has had as complex questions to solve as the Supreme Court of the United States was ever called upon to pass on. They are an exemplary body and are doing good work.

Mr. STOKES. I would like to put a question to the chairman of the committee. In line 21 of this section I find it provided that—

The number of such commissioners is hereby fixed at four.

I notice also that in the first line there is provision for the salaries of four commissioners under acts of Congress approved March 3, 1893, and March 2, 1895.

Mr. SHERMAN. The commission originally consisted of five members; a couple of years ago we cut down the number to four.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I want to occupy just a moment in calling attention to what I understand to be the condition of things in the Indian Territory, for the purpose of suggesting to the committee whether it would not be wise to increase this appropriation to six hundred and some odd thousand dollars, according to the estimate, so that this work may be completed in from two to three years—three years, I think, was the statement of the gentleman in charge of the bill—instead of allowing it to drag along for five or six years. Of course I shall not myself make any such motion, because I have not given the matter such close investigation as would authorize me to do so. But my object at this time is to draw the attention of the committee to this matter and ascertain whether in their judgment it would not be wise to increase this appropriation to the amount of the estimate.

As I understand, there could not be a worse condition of affairs than now exists in the Indian Territory. It is patent that we are after a while to solve the problem in the Indian Territory so that we shall have local self-government there, so that the people may administer justice in that Territory and pay for it, so that the people there may be educated and may pay for it. As I understand, there is nowhere under the sun a better agricultural country, with a larger proportion of mineral wealth, than there is in that Territory. But, as I understand, nowhere is there a condition of things coming nearer to "organized hell" than there is in that Territory.

A little farther on in the bill is a provision on which I hope a point of order will be made—a provision appropriating $75,000 out of the Federal Treasury for the education of children other than Indian children. If we enter upon an expenditure of that kind, it will grow and grow and grow. The people will be demoralized, and in one sense pauperized; for whatever may be the case with the Indians, you can not take white people and feed them without cost to themselves and educate them without cost to themselves without creating an effort on their part to perpetuate that condition. And thereby the manhood of such people is demoralized. So that I again ask the committee in charge of this bill whether it would not be best to appropriate the full amount of the estimate and let this work be brought to the most speedy conclusion possible.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, as I have been closely connected with this work since my membership in Congress, I feel as if it were due to my distinguished friend from Texas and to the House that I make a statement of the condition of things there as I understand them.

The commission after its organization and until June, 1898, had no power except the power of negotiation. It had no power to take a census, no power to enroll the citizens, no power to make allotments. The sole function of the commission was simply to secure treaty stipulations or agreements between the United States and those tribes, looking to the opening of their country and the breaking up of their tribal relations.

The act of June, 1898, known as the Curtis law, provided that this commission, after its membership had been reduced to four, should make a roll of the citizens. That involved an amount of labor which no man unfamiliar with the condition of things out there can appreciate. They at once set about their work, and in the first ninety days 7,000 applications were made that were contested by the tribe. Every case required a careful judicial investigation and a hearing of much testimony. The work involved in that one duty can scarcely be conceived. Appeals from the decisions of the commission to the Federal courts were afterwards allowed. Since that time the commissioners have, day in and day out, been bombarded with other applications of those claiming citizenship.

The truth of the business is that this commission in the discharge of this duty are called upon to decide greater interests and more delicate interests than any commission that I have known of in the history of the country, at least so far as these people are concerned.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. Will my friend answer a question?

Mr. LITTLE. Why, certainly.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. Do you not believe that it is better for the Indians and better for this country that this work should be expeditiously done?

Mr. LITTLE. Oh, God bless you, yes.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. Then why not yield to the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and get this work done?

Mr. LITTLE. Just wait until I get through and you will think I will.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. All right; that is what I want to see done.

Mr. LITTLE. But the statements made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURKE] have led me to make this statement, because the gentlemen who compose this commission I know want the Congress and the country to understand what they have done and are doing.

Now, as I started to say a moment ago, the enrollment of this citizenship involves millions and millions of dollars to those who are claiming it, as well as to the tribes. Every human being admitted to these rolls adds one more to share in the division of the land, and each share in some tribes is estimated to be worth at least $5,000 per head, some of them being entitled to from six to seven or eight hundred acres of land; others not so much. It is a bid and a great temptation for people to attempt to procure citizenship in the tribe.

In addition to that roll they are required to make certain rolls of colored people, freedmen and their descendants. Without any basis, practically, they must go back to the treaty of 1866. It has involved a vast amount of time in the hearing of testimony and the examination of the rolls, and the labor involved can scarcely be appreciated.

And I want to say now that so far as my knowledge has gone—and I think I know a good deal about the situation—I never have known a commission or any Government employees who did more work or, in my opinion, more faithful work than this commission has done since it was given the power under the act of 1898. There is no sort of question about it, and they ought to be continued. Not only ought they be continued, but in my opinion every dollar that is necessary to enable them speedily and as soon as possible to complete this work and straighten out the conditions in the Indian Territory, ought to be given them without stint and without delay.

Why, sir, do you know that as things are now in that country scarcely anyone knows where his home is? No noncitizen has any right to the lands outside of the towns, and in this condition of uncertainty there are more than 400,000 people without any government save that which they get through the judiciary of that country, without any free schools for the people, with no educational opportunities for the noncitizen element, including the whites, negroes, and others not citizens of these particular tribes, except in some of the larger towns.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Arkansas be extended ten minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LITTLE. I thank the House. I shall hardly want to use that much time. This is the condition that is confronting us before anything can be done, as is well suggested by my friend Mr. CANNON. Before any definite plan can be adopted these rolls of citizenship must be settled, these lands must be appraised and allotted to their respective owners. Then the country will be ready for some form of government, whatever the Congress may deem wise to determine, and I do not believe they will make it in accordance with the views expressed by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FLYNN]. I hope it may never become a part of Oklahoma.

But let that go. Now, what is ahead of the commission is the appraisement of the lands. It is not like an ordinary allotment of Indian lands on the reservations of the West. These lands are to be allotted according to their quality, quantity, and value, necessitating the appraisement of every foot of land in that Territory, involving, I believe, some 36,000 square miles, with houses and improvements, and with railroads running through it, and a great diversity in values of the land. But it is hoped that if the amount of money that was estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury was given to this commission the fundamental part of this work could be completed in two years, and I believe it can be. Yes, probably it may be completed in less time. The completion of the roll and the allotment of the land, I think, can be completed in less time. Other matters may involve the time of this commission for a year or two, possibly longer than that, or whatever power has the disposition of them.

But I agree distinctly with the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURKE] that the money needed by this commission, every dollar that is legitimately and properly spent to complete this work, ought to be appropriated, and my view is that the amount carried in this bill ought to be more than it is. I finally consented to the amount carried in the bill, but I believe it would be wise to increase it at least a hundred thousand dollars, if not to give the entire amount. I feel quite satisfied that an increase of the amount by $100,000 would greatly facilitate the completion of the work of the commission in that Territory. It will be wise economy to push this work to an early conclusion, and it will be a great saving to the Government and a blessing to the people of that country.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, just a word in reference to the commission. I think the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] alluded to it briefly. This is not a commission which is desirous of continuing its work in office or in power. Senator Dawes has more than once asked to be relieved from further service upon this commission, and has been kept there only at the urgent solicitation of various Secretaries in power, by the earnest solicitation of men in and out of public life who are familiar with the conditions in the Indian Territory, who are familiar with the power that Mr. Dawes's name has with those Indians, and in compliance with the urgent request of these gentlemen and of the President Mr. Dawes has remained on the commission, and has given to it the full benefit of his plenitude of wisdom. Of course, he has not been at all times in the Indian Territory. His age and his infirmities will not permit it. But he has given his time to the work of the commission. He has had no other business to occupy his time, as I understand it.

The commission is not a partisan commission. One of the members, Judge McKinnon, of Arkansas, is a Democrat, and were it not for the very high opinion I have of the character of my friend from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE] I would say that no finer man lives in the State of Arkansas than Judge McKinnon. It is a nonpartisan commission. Judge McKinnon and Mr. Needles and Mr. Bixby are in the Indian Territory all the time, except the few weeks when they are here in Washington in consultation with the committees of the two branches of Congress and with the Secretary. They have done most efficient and most energetic service down there.

Now, in reference to this appropriation, as to whether it shall be $300,000 or a greater sum, the estimate calls for $641,000. It is the desire of the Indian Committee, as I believe it is the desire of every committee in this House having charge of appropriations, to keep these appropriations down to the very smallest amount possible compatible with what is for the best interest of the Government and of the service, and we hoped that we might find it possible to appropriate a less sum than that called for by the estimates submitted. We asked the commission to come before us, and Mr. Bixby, the member of the commission most familiar with the details, was heard at length, as was also Senator Dawes, in reference to other matters.

I will read the following from the hearing before the committee:

Mr. CURTIS. What is your judgment about how long will it take to complete this work, if we make the appropriation as originally asked for by you, $171,000?

Mr. BIXBY. I think it would take in the neighborhood of four or five years. That is my judgment.

Mr. FLYNN. But do you think you could do it all if you got your $640,000 in a year?

Mr. BIXBY. No, sir. In about two years we could do all the appraising and all the surveying. We can not fix the date of closing the work until we can get Congress to fix the date for closing the rolls.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Do you say that with this appropriation you can finish in two years?

Mr. BIXBY. In two or three years.

Mr. FLYNN. The shorter the time, the more money it will take?

Mr. BIXBY. The shorter the time, the less money it will take. If we have $600,000 for this next year, the following two years we would want very much less money.

Mr. FLYNN. Under the present system, you think you could finish in five years.

Mr. BIXBY. Yes, sir.

Mr. LITTLE. The survey and appraising are important elements, which must precede the allotments. With this increased appropriation they could finish this coming year and discharge all these surveying and appraising forces. The actual allotment follows the appraising.

Mr. SHERMAN. The work you are doing now is entirely satisfactory to you, is it not? You feel satisfied with the progress you are making?

Mr. BIXBY. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. And it is satisfactory to the Indians?

Mr. BIXBY. I think it is reasonably so. I think the Indians are very well satisfied with the progress of our work.

Mr. SHERMAN. Do you think the Indians would be quite as well satisfied to have a small army sent into their midst, as you would have to do in case of this enlarged appropriation, to carry on their work, instead of going on as you are doing now?

Mr. BIXBY. I think the Choctaws and the Chickasaws would be very glad to have us crowd the work. The other nations are saying nothing about it. The Choctaws and Chickasaws are anxious to have the allotments, because conditions are changing. The land is in good order and appraised in accordance with its value relative to its location, and the timber which may be appraised this month or estimated at a certain amount in two years from now may be gone. It may be stolen or burnt up, and that would interfere a great deal with the final adjustment, unless it is crowded as fast as it is practicable to do it.

* * * * * * *

Mr. FLYNN. Is it not a fact that the Creeks selected a delegation to come on here with full authority to so amend their agreement as to meet the views of Congress and that authority has been denied them to come here?

Mr. BIXBY. I understood that was so, but I understand that difficulty will be overcome.

Mr. SHERMAN. You can go on with this $171,000 without much change, as you have been doing, and with entire satisfaction to the Indians and the commission, can you not?

Mr. BIXBY. I think the Choctaws and Chickasaws would not be entirely satisfied, and we are not entirely satisfied, for the reason that we wish to get through with this business. Of course, we are satisfied with whatever Congress does, but when you ask us if we are entirely satisfied I would desire to say that we are anxious to get through with this work in a reasonable time. We would think that it would not be good business judgment to give us less than $300,000. We would like $900,000.

Mr. LITTLE. I want to see if I understand your position correctly? If I understand you, the commission takes the position that all the lands of each particular tribe must be appraised before any allotment can be made?

Mr. BIXBY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to proceed for five or ten minutes longer.

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, there is this about this work. There must, of course, be a survey, and then an appraisement. The allotment follows. The allotment is not made in the manner that the allotments are made in an ordinary Indian reservation, where lands are drawn out by section or quarter section and allotted.

The Curtis law provides that in allotting every Indian shall be allotted land which shall be the equivalent in value of the allotment to every other Indian. It is not necessary that each Indian receive 160 acres of land; but whatever amount of land he receives it shall be of the same value as the allotment every other Indian of the tribe received, be that 10 acres or 160 acres. After the survey and appraisal which precedes these allotments are made, the allotments must then be made to the Indians entitled thereto. In order to ascertain to whom these allotments are to be made, the rolls must be completed; and, as suggested by my friend from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE], there are pending several thousand appeals as to whether or not the Indians are entitled to a place upon these rolls, which would give them that allotment.

The Curtis Act provided the manner in which the Dawes Commission should ascertain what names were entitled to a place on these rolls, and it provided, and properly, I think, that where any party, be it man, woman, or child, or the Government, feels aggrieved by the decision of the Dawes Commission there should be an appeal to the United States court, and in many hundreds, if not in many thousands, of these cases these appeals have been taken; and many of these appeals are now pending. Of course, a single appeal in many cases will determine hundreds of cases, they being of like character; but many of these are now pending, and if the work of survey and appraisement were finished at the present moment it would not be possible to go on and allot these lands in all cases.

In the Seminole Nation the survey and the appraisement is already finished, but the allotment has not yet been completed. That is the condition of affairs there. Now, Mr. Bixby believes that with this $641,000 he has asked for the work of survey and appraisal for the two great nations—the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations—could be completed within the next year, and that by the time that is done the rolls of those two nations will be practically completed, so that, following immediately on the completion of that work, they could go on and allot to all the Indians of those two nations, and that in future years the work will be done in the same way for the Cherokee and Creek nations.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think that briefly gives to this committee all the information that the Committee on Indian Affairs had before the committee. It is my belief that $300,000 was the least with which they could advantageously work, and that they could work advantageously with $600,000, but in our desire to economize we took the less sum. Possibly, Mr. Chairman, it was not the best judgment to so do. Possibly the suggestion of my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] had better be followed, and we appropriate $641,000. If my friend from Illinois or any other gentleman of the committee feels inclined to make that motion, I shall not oppose it.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me a word right there?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I do not feel well enough advised to make the motion. My remarks were in the shape of a question and suggestion. I could not for a moment antagonize what seems to be the best judgment of the gentleman from New York and his committee; but if the gentleman is evenly balanced as to whether it ought to be $300,000 or $600,000, and believes that $600,000 would expedite this work, I should be in favor of the larger sum. I will follow the gentleman as he may indicate in regard to the amount.

Mr. SHERMAN. Of course, Mr. Chairman, I believe that more work would be completed during the next fiscal year with $641,000 than with $300,000, but I very much doubt if the character of the work would be as satisfactory. That is my individual opinion. I have read from the minutes taken from our committee—by our own stenographer, by the way, because we could not get one of the committee stenographers—giving you what was said before that committee. My present judgment is that $300,000 will insure sufficient service during the coming year, a service which will insure the completion of the work in the Indian Territory within a maximum limit of five years.

Mr. RIDGELY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that this Territory borders my district its entire length, a distance of about 150 miles. Very naturally a large number of citizens, amounting to many thousands, from my part of Kansas are now living in the Indian Territory under leases permissible by law, and are engaged in business of various kinds, principally farming. These people, as well as others that have come from almost every State in the Union, are urging upon Congress and this commission, known as the Dawes Commission, that we shall make haste to establish order and law and rights to property.

I am receiving letters almost every day from people living in that Territory, saying, "In God's name, hurry up and do something." While each one has an idea as to what is best to do, they all agree upon one thing, and that is that we shall make haste and get this work finished as soon as possible, so as to establish rights to property, rights to citizenship, and give them the opportunity to regulate their own affairs, levy their own taxes, establish their own schools, and conduct a civilized condition of society.

Therefore, I offer my views and say that we should crowd forward in this work; and while I would not dissent from the bill, neither will I make the motion to increase the appropriation, because I realize, as the gentleman from Arkansas says, whose State also borders this country, that there are such complex interests and so much involved that I should hesitate to do it. There is involved in it the rights of citizenship, the allotment and apportionment of the property, not in acres or area, but in value.

But let us crowd the work as fast as possible. I hope the discussion and impression made on the commission will be that the temper and sentiment of Congress is to crowd forward with the work, and if the chairman can consent to increase the amount I should be glad. As he said, he will not seriously oppose the judgment of the committee if we shall see fit to raise it; but realizing the gravity of the work in hand and the danger that might result in putting a large army of inexperienced agents down there to take up the work, and from the fact that it might result in great injustice, I defer to the judgment of the chairman and members of the committee.

Now, while I have the floor upon this matter, I want to say that this Indian Territory problem will keep coming back to Congress for many years. We shall be called upon to legislate affecting the property rights and the rights of citizenship by reason of the conditions under which they have developed that country. I want to impress upon the House that whenever legislation shall come up affecting land titles, to take good care to see that the apportionment of real estate in that Territory shall be fairly and equitably made at the time it shall be completed, and I urge that such a provision shall be made as will forever prevent the centralization of land titles in that part of our country at least.

I think it well, gentlemen, that we should begin to apply this to our lands as a settled principle. We have long since fixed it as a national policy that the Government domain—the public lands of this country—shall not be parted with in large tracts. And why? Because we want to provide homes for all our people, so that every family may be a home-owning family. But we have in every instance failed to keep a sufficient restrictive hold upon the title to our lands. We should be watchful to provide that when title passes from these Indians it shall be on conditions that will forever prevent the centralization of large bodies of these lands in any one ownership, for just in proportion as the acres shall centralize in the hands of a few owners, in that proportion shall we multiply renters. Let us at least provide proper limitation in fixing the land laws and land policy of this Territory.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I believe it would be economy, both of time and money, to change this appropriation from $300,000 to $600,000; and in view of the facts before me I shall deem it my duty to offer and press a provision to that effect. There are about 20,000,000 acres of land, of the value, probably, of $5 an acre, belonging to the Five Tribes in the Indian Territory, making a total valuation of $100,000,000. We find there are 65,000 Indians among whom this land must be equitably allotted. If the lands were of uniform value, there would be little difficulty in making the allotments.

But when the parties whose duty it is to make these allotments come to discharge that duty they will find that it will require a great amount of time to allot these lands equitably, because of the great difference in the value of the land, and in order to expedite the work a greatly increased force will be needed. The surveying has to be done, as explained by other members of the committee, before the lands can be allotted. We can use as many surveying corps at the same time as the appropriation will permit to be employed; and if we will give the commissioners money to put to work a large force of surveyors, the surveying can be finished within a few months. Then after the surveys have been made the allotting officers can determine the value of the land and give to each Indian his pro rata share.

In the Creek territory, under the provisions of the Curtis bill, a great many Indians have selected 160 acres of land, with the understanding among them that when the final allotment is made they can continue to hold the lands they have selected. In such cases there will not be much work for the allotting committee to do. I believe that inside of two years, as stated by the commission, this work can be accomplished and the whole business finally adjusted.

Another matter of great interest to the white men living in the Territory relates to town sites. That subject belongs, however, to another committee; but let me say here that I hope a large appropriation for that purpose will be made, so that all the town lots in the Territory may be speedily surveyed, valued, and sold. The citizens interested in town lots and improvements should be permitted without unnecessary delay to purchase those lots and improvements, and thus become the owners of the property in which they have invested their money and labor. When we have allotted these lands among the Indians and sold the town lots, this magnificent domain can be made a part of Oklahoma and will be well fitted to form one of the best States of the Southwest.

I repeat that in my judgment we can save both time and money and accomplish a much earlier adjustment of all these questions if this appropriation be increased to $600,000. I therefore make that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 5 strike out "three" and insert "six;" so as to read "$600,000;" and in the summing up strike out "two" and insert "five;" so as to make the aggregate $576,000.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. Mr. Chairman, may I submit a parliamentary inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. Would it be competent or proper for me now to move an additional amendment to that of my colleague?

The CHAIRMAN. It would be.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. Then I offer the following:

And the commission shall finish the entire work allotted to them under existing laws within a period of three years from this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair misunderstood the gentleman. It was the impression of the Chair that the gentleman proposed to offer an amendment to the amendment of his colleague. But this is a separate or independent proposition.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. Then it would be proper to offer and vote upon this after the amendment of my colleague is disposed of?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. RIDGELY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a few words upon the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS]. While I am very anxious to see this work expedited in every reasonable way, I fear that if we adopt this rushing policy, providing that the work be done within a very limited number of months, we shall but pile upon ourselves and the country much greater expense than would be entailed if we should proceed a little more carefully in adjusting these complicated questions.

I hope that this work may be pushed as fast as can possibly be done with safety and justice to all parties interested. But, sir, I fear that if we put a number of "green hands" upon this work and let them undertake to adjust these questions of title and these matters of citizenship, we shall get ourselves and the people there into such a complicated condition as will do great injustice and will in the end involve much expense, while operating to delay the real work of an equitable adjustment. I therefore, sir, fear the effects of the amendment of the gentleman from Texas, and shall vote with the chairman of the committee against it.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, it was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

That said commission shall continue to exercise all authority heretofore conferred on it by law.

Mr. BELLAMY. Mr. Chairman, I had the honor some time since of introducing into this House a bill providing for the education and support of the children of the Croatan Indians of North Carolina. On yesterday the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs very courteously accorded to me an opportunity to address the committee upon the subject. Several of the members requested me, on account of their interest, to present them to the House.

Mr. Chairman, the Indians of the United States are peculiarly the wards of the nation, and very justly they should be so regarded and so dealt with. They were once the proud possessors of our soil, but to the inexorable decree of fate they have succumbed, and the Teutonic race, against which in its progress all less civilized peoples have given away and retired, has pressed them westward, and the plains and forests of the eastern slope and seaboard of America, once their happy haunts and hunting grounds, is inhabited no longer by them, except by the remnants of a few scattered tribes which almost have been, but not entirely, absorbed by contact with the white man and his allies.

The white settlers of America, while they wrested from the aborigines the soil on which they dwelt, which on account of the nomadic habits of the Indian tribes could hardly be said to be possessed by them, have been from the earliest period of our history imbued with a laudable feeling that justice and humanity required that the Indians should receive Government consideration and protection, that they might acquire fixed abodes, and by civilizing influences they might, in the course of time, become co-sharers in the blessings of a free Government.

The last tribe left lingering on the scene of these once royal domains is the Croatans or Hatteras Indians, inhabiting the State of North Carolina, about 60 miles from the seaboard, in the counties of Robeson, Scotland, Richmond, and Columbus, and there they have been for a period so long that the "memory of man runneth not to the contrary thereof." That they have not claimed the attention of the National Government before is a matter which excites great surprise and is hard to be explained, unless the smallness of their number and the lack of education and enlightenment among them, and the want of proper philanthropy among their neighbors, has caused them to be entirely overlooked. And yet the public mind has been directed to them on more than one occasion when they have shocked the country by some atrocity which is incident to the Indian character.

There are in the settlement in Robeson County, where they chiefly reside, about 3,000 souls, and with the scattered families in adjoining counties the number may run to 2,000 men, making the tribe about 5,000 people. A number of them have migrated to Georgia, Mississippi, and Florida, where they have become absorbed in the body politic. They are the most interesting people in America, and no tribe can appeal stronger to the tender sympathies and the generous beneficence of the American people than the Croatan Indians of North Carolina. They, beyond cavil or doubt, are the descendants of the lost colony of Sir Walter Raleigh, about which there have been for over three hundred years so many sad reflections.

Those at all familiar with the attempts at colonization made by our English ancestors may recall the efforts of that gallant knight and learned and ambitious favorite of Queen Elizabeth.

Not only could Sir Walter throw his cloak on the wet ground that it might serve a footcloth for the dainty shoe of Elizabeth, but he sought to extend the domains of Her Most Gracious Majesty that her reign might become memorable in the annals of history and her Empire strengthened and enriched.

In the year 1584 Raleigh fitted out a fleet of ships under Amadas and Barlow and discovered the country that is now known as North Carolina, but then called Virginia, in honor of the virgin Queen. Soon thereafter he began to make efforts to colonize the new Eldorado. Two attempts failed; but undaunted, in 1587, in three ships under John White, whom he appointed governor, he sent over 117 persons, including 17 women, and of the fate of these people nothing is known or has been discovered with absolute certainty from that day to this, unless this is shown by the remarks I shall now make, and which was first attempted by my old friend and preceptor, Hamilton McMillan. These 117 colonists were left on Roanoke Island, near the "harbor of Hatorask," and there, on August 18, 1587, the daughter of Governor White, the wife of Ananias Dare, gave birth to a daughter, the first white child born on American soil, and named and baptized, in honor of Her Majesty, Virginia Dare.

The ships, leaving the colony, returned for supplies and recruits, but when they reached England the Kingdom was agitated by a threatened invasion from Spain. Afterwards the Spanish Armada was defeated, and when peace was once more restored Raleigh looked around to provide for the relief of his colony which he had planted in the New World a few years before. But it was not until 1590 that Governor White was dispatched to their rescue, and when he reached Roanoke, in August, he found the island deserted; no trace of a human being could be found, but at the site of the village where the settlers were left nearly three years before there was found a tree which had been deprived of its bark and bore, in clear and well-cut characters, the word "Croatan."

There had been an understanding by White with the colonists before leaving that if they should remove their location they should carve on a tree the name of the place to which they had gone; and if they were in danger or sore distress they should carve a cross above the name on the tree. White finding the absence of the cross was buoyed with the hope of their discovery, but after all efforts to trace them had proved fruitless, he was forced to abandon the search and reluctantly returned to England.

The lost colony was never heard of, and their sad fate is a matter of deep and pathetic interest to the American people. Whether they went to Croatan voluntarily or whether the men were massacred and the women taken for wives, or whether both men and women intermarried with the Hatteras Indians is only a matter of conjecture. But one fact is known, and that is that Lawson, in his History of Carolina, written in the year 1714, imparts to us that—

The Hatteras Indians, who lived on Roanoke Island or much frequented it, tell us that several of their ancestors were white people and could talk in a book, as we do; the truth of which is confirmed by gray eyes being found frequently among those Indians and no others. They value themselves extremely for their affinity to the English, and are ready to do them all friendly offices. It is probable that the settlement miscarried for want of timely supplies from England or through the treachery of the natives, for we may reasonably suppose that the English were forced to cohabit with them for relief and conversation, and that in process of time they confined themselves to the manners of their Indian relations, and thus we see how apt human nature is to degenerate.

Long prior to the Revolutionary war there was found settled near Lumber River, in Robeson County, N. C., a tribe of Indians. Many of them had blue eyes, and while possessing all other traits and characteristics of Indians—the copper color, the high cheek bone, the erect form—yet they lacked the nomadic habit. They were settled in a neighborhood where they still remain, then, as now, cultivating maize and potatoes and fruits. Their traditions then, as now, were that their ancestors, Indian men, married white women; that they came from Roanoke (in Virginia, they say); that they were driven away by bad Indians, and, as one now about 90 years of age told your speaker, that they were driven across the river. Most of them own their own land, which they either bought from the early settlers—who, on account of the Indian being already in possession, quitclaimed it for a nominal consideration—or obtained it by an entry and grant from the Commonwealth. The names of the 117 lost colonists are still preserved in Hakluyt, Volume III, wherein is given an account of "The fourth voyage made to Virginia with three ships in the year 1587, wherein was transported the second colony."

From the list of names are many now and from the earliest times borne by men of this tribe, such as John Sampson, Robert Wilkinson, Henry Berry, Richard Berry, John Burden, Henry Dorrel (Dial), John Cheven, William Berden, and many others. Thus it is seen that their blue eyes, the tradition of the white mothers, the locality from which they came, the lack of the nomadic habit derived from the infusion of English blood, the similarity of names, the tradition of being driven by the bad Indians across the river, doubtless by the warlike and hostile Tuscaroras, who inhabited also the neighboring coast country, prove conclusively to the student of the question that the lost colony of Raleigh has been found. They are a remarkable people. It is said by old residents that some of these Indians were volunteers in the Revolutionary war. That they sent two companies to the war of 1812 is well authenticated.

They made gallant soldiers, as a number of our oldest inhabitants can testify. From the earliest times up to the year 1835 they went to school with the whites, voted and shared in the privileges of citizenship. But in that year the constitution of North Carolina was amended, and thereafter for a period of thirty-three years they were deprived, not only of the right to vote, but even of the privileges of education, until the constitution of 1868 was passed, whereby they became restored to citizenship and to school privileges of the most meager character, but such as other citizens enjoyed.

They were not permitted to attend the schools for whites, and therefore were forced, if they received any education, to attend the negro schools. They refused to a very great degree, on account of the intense antipathy they now have for the negro, the education in the negro schools until, through the instrumentality of Hamilton McMillan, esq., the legislature of North Carolina, in 1887, gave them separate schools of their own.

At the breaking out of hostilities between the North and the South in 1861 these people, grown up in ignorance, but quietly cultivating their little farms, were rudely awakened by the Confederate authorities conscripting them and using them as laborers to build the immense sand fortifications at New Inlet, on the Cape Fear River, known as Fort Fisher; the same fortifications so celebrated as having been the scene of the greatest naval bombardment of the world's history, as compared with which an officer who was at Sebastopol said:

The siege of Sebastopol as compared with the siege of Fort Fisher was but child's play.

The work was hard, the Croatan murmured; he then deserted and fled to the swamps of his native heath. The conscripting officers pursued them. Arresting an old Indian, they asked him why he deserted. He told them that he did not want to work or fight for a people who treated him so unjustly; that before 1835 he voted, he went to school, but since then he had been deprived of both, and that he would neither work nor fight for the Confederacy. And thus it was they were arrested and deserted. When at the close of the war many of them were in hiding, they committed acts of depredation, for which they were properly outlawed, and then arose the band known as the Henry Berry Lowery gang. For years they became a terror to the country, and in the early seventies this band of Indians shot down and killed 27 white men from first to last among the wealthiest, the bravest, and best men of that county. The leader, Henry Berry Lowery, was finally killed, peace and quiet was again restored, and under the benign influence and rule of our people, inaugurated in the year 1887, they are becoming good citizens.

There is still much ignorance and a strong propensity to violate the internal-revenue laws among some few of them, but it is because they know not the sinfulness of the violation of law. They from time immemorial have raised fine fruit and grain, and have always distilled brandy and whisky, and, like some other citizens, they feel that it is an unjust interference with their natural rights to prevent them from converting their waste products into a salable article. Many of the cases in our United States courts for manufacturing without license are from among these people. They are and have always been a distinct people. They are true friends, but bitter and implacable enemies.

They are brave, but reckless. They are honest in their dealings. They are intensely religious. They are restless, active, and energetic. Indolence and sloth are not known among them. They are eager for education. They are capable of intellectual and moral development, as is attested by some among them. A number have become successful merchants. One of them filled the position of United States Senator from one of our sister Southern States. The descendant of another has become a member of Congress.

Now, these are the people I commend to the kind consideration of the American Congress. Their school facilities are poor. By extending them aid you are giving expression in substantial form to that noble sentiment of justice inherent in our people and which has urged our Government to make large appropriations for the education and support of Indian tribes which passes each session of Congress. No tribe is entitled to more at our hands; and if in the providence of God they be elevated by a sound moral and mental training inaugurated by the Government, history will yet say that Sir Walter Raleigh did not plant his colony in vain, and there will yet arise some gifted American writer who will perpetuate in song and weave in fiction the story of the Croatan Indians, the descendants of the Indian chief, Manteo, created the first Lord of Roanoke, and of Virginia Dare, the first white child born on American soil. [Applause.]

During the delivery of the foregoing the following occurred:

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BROSIUS. Are we proceeding by unanimous consent now?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from North Carolina to move to strike out the last word.

Mr. BELLAMY. Yes; I make that motion.

Mr. BROSIUS. I desire to know, for my own purpose, how long a time the gentleman proposes to occupy.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has five minutes, under the rule.

The time of Mr. BELLAMY having expired, by unanimous consent it was extended.

Mr. BELLAMY then resumed and completed the delivery of the foregoing.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas on the 18th day of November, 1899, Charles Dennis, a Seneca Indian, leased to the Erie Preserving Company, as a site for a manufacturing plant, a certain piece of land near the village of Irving, N. Y.; and whereas on the 29th day of December, 1899, the said lease was confirmed, ratified, and approved by the council of the Seneca Nation of Indians, according to its terms and conditions: Now, therefore, the action of the said Charles Dennis and of said Seneca Nation, by its council, is ratified, confirmed, and approved.

Whereas the Seneca Nation of Indians, in their council, held on the 11th day of September, 1897, entered into an agreement in writing with John Quilter, whereby said Seneca Nation leased to the said John Quilter all that portion of the Cattaraugus Reservation situate in the towns of South Valley and Elko, Cattaraugus County, N. Y., for the purpose of boring and testing said territory for gas and oil under certain conditions set forth in said agreement: Now, therefore, the action of said Seneca Nation, by its council, is ratified, confirmed, and approved.

Whereas the Seneca Nation of New York Indians, in their council, held on the 13th day of January, 1899, entered into an agreement in writing with John Quilter, whereby said Seneca Nation leased to the said Quilter, his heirs, and assigns, the Cattaraugus Reservation, situate in the counties of Erie, Chautauqua, and Cattaraugus, for the purpose of boring and testing said territory for gas and oil under certain conditions set forth in said agreement: Now, therefore, the action of said Seneca Nation, by its council, is ratified, confirmed, and approved.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to strike out beginning with line 8, page 41, down to and including line 13, on page 42.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For increasing the amount hereinbefore appropriated for the erection of said asylum for insane Indians at Canton, S. Dak., the sum of $15,000, the said sum being in addition to the amount appropriated for that purpose by the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for other purposes," approved March 1, 1899.

Mr. CANNON. I will ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] to agree to the following amendment:

And the limit of cost for said asylum is fixed at the amount heretofore and herein appropriated, namely, $60,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; I will be glad to agree to that.

The amendment of Mr. CANNON was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the support of a school for the blind, to be provided for by contract by the Secretary of the Interior, in the Indian Territory, the sum of $10,000. And the Secretary of the Interior, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, may admit to such school blind children of other than Indian blood residing in such Territory. So much of said expenditure as may be found by the Secretary of the Interior to be incurred on behalf of Indian children shall be paid out of the school funds of the tribe to which such child belongs.

Mr. CANNON. I am compelled to make the point of order on that whole paragraph, for the reason, as I understand it, that there is no existing law that authorizes the expenditure.

As I read the paragraph, it provides by contract for a school for the blind, and not only for the Indians, but for the white children as well. I do not know of any treaty stipulation that would authorize the expenditure; I do not know of any law that authorizes it; and I am quite sure that when under the guise of education and taking care of the Indian tribes we propose to take care of the blind of the State, there is pretty large departure; and without further discussing its merits, I make the point of order.

Mr. MERCER. Which paragraph is that?

Mr. CANNON. It is from line 13 to 22, inclusive.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York care to be heard upon the point of order?

Mr. SHERMAN. Does the gentleman from Arkansas desire to be heard on the point of order? I would be glad for the gentleman from Arkansas to discuss it.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, appropriations are constantly made for the purpose of educating Indian children. That is a fixed and definite policy of the Government, and it does not require existing law to maintain a provision of that sort in the bill. We provide in almost every bill for buildings for the education of Indian children. We provide for their instruction, and we appropriate not under treaty stipulations for a great many Indian tribes; and the only possible vicious character there could be in this provision would be that it provides for the education of certain noncitizens, those who are residing in the Territory, but who are not members of the respective tribes, and permits them to be chargeable against the fund appropriated.

Now, passing from the legal status of the question, I would like to state that there is now a small school for the blind in the Territory, at Fort Gibson, being conducted by two or three young ladies, who are supporting it through charity collected not only in the Territory, but in the adjoining States. There are a great many applicants for admission. We did not appropriate for that school, because we do not think it is the proper thing to do. By this provision we authorize the Secretary of the Interior to use this much for that purpose, and to draw from the school fund of the respective tribes for the expenses of the Indian blind.

I understand that there are in the Territory approaching 200 blind children without any means of education at all. It appeals to me in the highest degree. So far as that is concerned, if it is not technically within the rules I should be glad to see it go through, because we can not do better than to extend our help to these blind people and give them a single school anyway, if it is only a very meager and unostentatious affair, so that when we reach the time when the taxes can be levied for the support of these schools legally it may be done.

Mr. CANNON. Let me ask the gentleman whether these exceedingly wealthy Indians in the Indian Territory known as the Five Civilized Tribes, with their great trust fund, with their great income from occupation tax, and especially from their income by way of royalties, from which there is money, substantially, almost to burn that might be, perhaps, under existing law, known as the Curtis law, without legislation devoted to this purpose of education? And if it can not be done under the Curtis law, could not this money be devoted by legislation to the education of the blind as money from their trust fund is now devoted to the education of those that are not blind?

Mr. LITTLE. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois, if he will examine for a moment the provision he will see it is provided that the money expended for the education of the Indian blind shall be taken from their school fund.

Mr. CANNON. Well, it seems to me I would take the whole amount from that fund.

Mr. LITTLE. I will say, further, as to the whole condition, when we speak of rich Indians, there are not a great many of them in possession of their property. It has not been allotted to them. They are not getting all its benefits, and will not until final allotment; and, in addition to that, a large number of white people located there pay taxes. For instance, a lawyer $25, a doctor $25, the laborer from $1 to $5 a year, a noncitizen who lives in that country, on an average, $5 per year taxes—taxes that go to the Indian tribes, taxes they do not get one penny's value for in return.

Mr. CANNON. Is it not quite in the power of Congress to take from this magnificent trust fund, as well as from the annual income from the sources that the gentleman speaks of, coming to the Five Civilized Tribes, as well as from the royalties, money to found and support these schools?

Mr. LITTLE. Why, of course, it is within the power of Congress.

Mr. CANNON. Then much stronger am I, on the merits as well as on the rules of the House, inclined to insist on the point of order; but I would not insist upon the point of order to an amendment that will devote the money of this trust fund to the purpose indicated.

Mr. LITTLE. Now, just a moment. The trouble about the matter is that there are five of these nations, and we would have to confuse their funds or build five of these institutions in order to accommodate the blind children of those tribes. This amendment is only intended to meet the present emergency and to provide temporary facilities. A charge is made against each particular one of these tribes for the expense of the education of the blind from the particular tribe that enters this school, to be provided for under the supervisory power of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I have no objection to the point of order——

Mr. LITTLE. I do not want to mislead my friend. I will say that all the money directly appropriated by this act would, I have no doubt, be expended by the Secretary of the Interior for the benefit of the noncitizen class in the Territory—that is, those not members of the tribes.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I believe that Congress has the power, and I am inclined to think it is the duty of Congress to take from these trust funds and from moneys raised by taxation, royalties, and otherwise, money sufficient to educate all the children in the Indian Territory, and if buildings are needed take the necessary amount for those. If there are five of the tribes, then one-fifth from each tribe to construct the buildings, and give the Secretary of the Interior plenary power. I believe we certainly have the power, and I think we have the right to do so. But, later on, we come to a provision that I must antagonize, an appropriation of $75,000 for the education of noncitizen children; and as this is along the same ground I thought I ought to antagonize this with the hope that it will go out upon a point of order and that the Committee on Indian Affairs, pending the completion of the consideration of this bill, may report or offer such amendment as will care for these children as well as they may be cared for in their present condition, the expenditure to be borne by the trust funds.

Mr. LITTLE. I have no doubt the point of order will be good against the second amendment mentioned by the gentleman from Illinois, but the purpose of this amendment is, where the Secretary has got control of the Indian school, to admit into the same school with the Indians the noncitizen children. It refers to what you might call a day school in the rural districts of the Territory, where you can get a teacher for $40 a month and perhaps 20 Indian and 20 white pupils. By this appropriation you will be able to compensate the teachers and have 40 pupils together in a day school. Although simple as it may be, it will be a great improvement over not having any.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Arkansas to contend that the point of order is not well taken?

Mr. LITTLE. I do as to the present amendment, the one under discussion; but as to the one referred to by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] further along I think it would be good.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not informed as to what the present amendment is.

Mr. CANNON. It is on page 43, lines 23 to 32, inclusive.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand that to that provision the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] raises the point of order?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Arkansas to contend that the point of order is not well taken?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be glad to hear what existing law there is for that appropriation.

Mr. LITTLE. I stated to the Chair that the general policy of the Government having charge of the education of Indian children warrants legislation along these lines without any express provision of the statute. There has hardly an appropriation bill passed for a number of years that has not provided for the construction of independent school buildings, or the establishment of new schools at different points throughout the country. What I maintain is that this appropriation is in line, although it reaches a different class with the general policy of the Government, and is therefore germane to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not contended that it is not germane. The point of order is that it is in violation of Rule XXI of the rules of the House.

Mr. LITTLE. I used the word germane inadvertently; I should have said it is not new legislation within the meaning of that rule.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not contended that it is new legislation; it is contended that it is an appropriation not authorized by any existing law, nor is it a public work in the progress of construction.

Mr. LITTLE. The point I wish to make clear is this: Take, for instance, the Committee on Military Affairs or Naval Affairs. The Committee on Naval Affairs provides for the construction of half a dozen ships. That is not under any provision of statute, but it is carrying out the general policy of the Government. This is an appropriation of money to establish a school, and although there is no general law calling for the appropriation, it is in the execution of a well-defined policy of the Government toward this class of people. While it may be new legislation technically speaking, I claim that it is carrying out the general line and purpose of the Government, and is not new legislation within the meaning of the rule, as I understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understands it, this section is challenged under section 2, Rule XXI, and under the first part of that section, which provides that—

> No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriation for such public work and objects as are already in progress.

The paragraph appropriates a sum of money for a school for the blind of the white and Indian races. This kind of education has not been before undertaken by the Government.

The attention of the Chair has not been directed to any particular provision of law which would authorize this appropriation; but the gentleman from Arkansas contends that it is in furtherance of a general public policy which Congress has adopted in the past.

Mr. LACEY. I would like to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that there is an Indian educational fund which Congress controls, and out of this fund may we not make provision for the education of Indian children, whether they be deaf, dumb, blind, or otherwise?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa understand that this appropriation comes from that fund?

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me make this suggestion: I think I catch the idea of the Chairman as well as that of the gentleman from Arkansas. I suggest to the gentleman from Arkansas that he moves to strike out the appropriation carried in this section so as simply to provide that the Secretary, out of money appropriated generally for school purposes, may expend a sum not exceeding $10,000 for the purpose named in this section. I think in that way the point of order would be obviated.

Mr. CANNON. It seems to me that in any event the point of order is well taken, and would not be obviated in the manner the gentleman suggests. There is no difference in substance between the amendment in the form now suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] and the amendment as now pending.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, yes.

Mr. CANNON. My point is that this is the first appropriation by law for this purpose, and that it is legislation—that it makes a charge upon the Treasury not authorized by law, and is therefore not in order upon this bill.

The gentleman says there have been other appropriations that were not authorized by law; ergo, this appropriation should be admitted. Now, there may have been appropriations subject to a point of order upon which no point was made; but that does not militate against a point of order on this provision.

Mr. SHERMAN. The idea which occurs to me is this—that this is simply a limitation upon an appropriation heretofore made; it does not make any new appropriation. My contention is that we can limit the manner in which appropriations heretofore made shall be expended.

Mr. CANNON. But does the gentleman claim——

The CHAIRMAN. Would it not be well to dispose of one provision of the bill at a time before raising any question upon another? It is difficult for the Chair to undertake to rule upon a section which has no further existence than a suggestion by one member to another.

Mr. LACEY. Let me call attention to the fact that the point of order as raised is too wide. It strikes at the whole section. If the gentleman would make his point of order against these words only, it might be admissible:

> And the Secretary of the Interior, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, may admit to such school blind children of other than Indian blood residing in such Territory.

That is a provision which enlarges existing law. The other provision for the use of school funds for blind Indian children is certainly already embraced in existing law. Under existing law blind children could go to the general schools; or the appropriation for schools under existing law could be so used as to allow the blind to be taught in an institution by themselves. The only difficulty is as to allowing white children to come in. That would seem to be a modification of existing law.

Mr. CANNON. In my judgment the whole thing is subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the question still presented for determination is whether the paragraph as reported in the bill is obnoxious to the point of order made under Rule XXI by the gentleman from Illinois. The Chair will restate the question as he understands it.

The objection is made that the paragraph is in violation of Rule XXI, which provides that—

> No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill or be in order as an amendment thereto for any expenditure not previously authorized by law unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress.

No law authorizing this appropriation has been brought to the attention of the Chair by any gentleman. The Chair does not understand that it is contended that the appropriation is authorized by any provision of existing law. But it is contended that, it being in furtherance of a great public object which the Congress of the United States has hitherto supported, it comes within the exception to the prohibition of Rule XVI as "a public work and object already in progress."

If the object of this appropriation is a public work and object already in progress, then it is in order in this bill. If it is not, it is not in order in this bill. It is unquestionably true that there are some decisions of previous presiding officers of the House and committee which sustain the construction of the rule for which the gentleman from Arkansas contends; the decision to which he refers, that a provision in a naval appropriation bill for the construction of ships is in order as a public work and object in progress because the policy of the Government is to construct and maintain a navy, is one of these. But although that decision has been followed always in like cases, it seems to the Chair that its authority has never been recognized as going beyond the exact facts of that case, and that it ought not to be extended.

Perhaps, also, the decisions with regard to railway mail special facilities would support the contention of the gentleman from Arkansas. On the other hand, there are many precedents giving to the words "public work or object already in progress" a much more restricted meaning. It has been held that an appropriation for a dry dock for the Navy was not in order on a general appropriation bill, by Mr. Butterworth on April 10, 1890, first session Fifty-first Congress; by Mr. Shively on April 13, 1892, first session Fifty-second Congress; by Mr. HOPKINS on March 25, 1896, first session Fifty-fourth Congress, and by Mr. SHERMAN on February 23, 1897, second session Fifty-fourth Congress. It is certainly difficult to distinguish in principle these decisions from the decision respecting the construction of ships.

The maintenance of the Light-House Service is a public object to which the Government is as fully committed as to the maintenance of a Navy. Yet it has been held that an appropriation for establishing a light (June 21, 1886, Reagan, first session Forty-ninth Congress) or for the construction of a tender for that service (June 21, 1886, Reagan, first session Forty-ninth Congress) was not in order.

On April 25, 1890, first session Fifty-first Congress, a point of order was made against an appropriation for nine members of the board of pension appeals, the law constituting the board providing only for three members. It was urged against the point of order that the granting of pensions was a public work or object in progress, and that the appropriation, being necessary to the execution of that work or object, was in order. Mr. Payson sustained the point of order.

The latter class of decisions seem to the present occupant of the chair to be in better accord with the spirit and purpose of Rule XXI. If the rule has the meaning which the gentleman from Arkansas attributes to it and the ship decision gives it, there would be little or nothing of significance or restraint in it. The appropriations committees would have a broader power than the rules intend to bestow upon them.

Finding some general purpose of Congress well established, they might appropriate for any instrumentality, however novel, which would promote that purpose. Such a construction of the rule would rob the legislative committees of their rightful jurisdiction. The Chair thinks that the words of the rule have a much more limited meaning; that the words "public work and objects already in progress" refer to specific and tangible things whose construction or support has heretofore been undertaken by the Government. Tested by this rule, the establishment of a school for the blind is not in order in this bill. Accordingly, the point of order is sustained.

Mr. FLYNN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment at the end of line 12.

The amendment was read, as follows:

After line 12 insert:

"For the support and education at Whitaker Orphan Home, Indian Territory, of 100 destitute orphan children of white persons who have lived and died among the Five Civilized Tribes, $10,000: Provided, That admission to said orphan home shall be under such restrictions and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, who is authorized to make a contract with said home for these purposes."

Mr. CANNON. I will just reserve the point of order, because I see my genial friend the Representative from Oklahoma is full of a speech, and I always like to hear him.

Mr. FLYNN. I had thought to be able to present my speech when the bill was reported from the Committee on Appropriations. I desire to say that this was authorized by the committee as an amendment to the Indian appropriation bill, but by an oversight of mine it was not printed in the bill. I do not deny that this is subject to the point of order. I will state that very frankly in the beginning. But in support of the amendment I would like to have the Clerk read a letter from the Secretary of the Interior transmitting the amendment, and I think possibly then that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] will withdraw his point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 8, 1900.

SIR: On February 4 last the Department transmitted a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the United States Senate, inclosing the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs upon a communication from the United States Indian agent at the Union Agency, Ind. T., and also W. T. Whittaker, manager of the Whittaker Orphan Home, at Pryor Creek, in said Territory, requesting an appropriation for said home, which communication, together with departmental letter of January 28, 1899, is contained in Senate Document No. 90, Fifty-fifth Congress, third session.

The Commissioner recommended that an appropriation of $15,000 be made for the maintenance of 100 pupils, to be added as an amendment to the Indian appropriation bill, as follows:

"For the support and education, at Whittaker Orphan Home, Indian Territory, of 100 destitute orphan children of white persons who have lived and died among the Five Civilized Tribes, $15,000: Provided, That admission to said orphan home shall be under such restrictions and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, who is authorized to make a contract with said home for these purposes."

In concluding said departmental letter it was stated:

"There can be no question that the purpose of maintaining the school for orphan children in said Territory is a laudable one, and the public welfare demands that proper facilities for education and due parental care be given to these waifs, who have neither homes, nor means, nor parents to care for them.

"I have, therefore, to recommend that said amendment be made to the Indian appropriation bill, as set forth in said report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the papers accompanying which are also herewith inclosed."

The Department is now in receipt of the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs upon a communication from said Whittaker, principal of the W. T. Whittaker Orphan Home, addressed to the President and Congress of the United States, requesting an appropriation of $30,000 for said home at Pryor Creek, Ind. T., in which he invites the attention of the Department to his report contained in said Senate Document No. 90, Fifty-fifth Congress, third session.

A copy of said communication from said Whittaker is inclosed herewith, and the Department renews its recommendation that the sum of $15,000 be appropriated for the maintenance of said orphan home, for the reason set out in the letters contained in said Senate Document No. 90.

Respectfully,

E. A. HITCHCOCK, Secretary.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. FLYNN. Now, Mr. Chairman, this is a pitiable and lamentable situation that exists down there. There are probably 400,000 white children in the Indian Territory. This gentleman has started a home, and has been conducting it for years on the public charity that he could secure from the outside. People move in there and some die. Their children are left there helpless. They are not Indians, and consequently are not the beneficiaries of any Indian appropriation. The question arises whether there is not some way in which these little waifs can be cared for. The Department recommends that it be placed as an amendment on this bill. It rests now with the House as to whether it shall be done or not.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman places upon me the seemingly ungracious duty of making the point of order upon this provision.

Mr. FLYNN. Oh, no; that was the very farthest thing from my intention.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman reads a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, and then states that there are 400,000 white children in the Indian Territory. I thought there were about 300,000, adults and children, Indians and white people, all together.

Now, the bare statement by a man who has started an orphan asylum down there that there are some orphan children in the Indian Territory who need care is a statement that at once attracts sympathy; and it was in view of this anomalous condition in the Indian Territory, and knowing that when you once opened the Pandora's box, with a continuation of that condition, you would have great trouble, that I a few moments ago earnestly asked the Committee on Indian Affairs if the $600,000 asked for by the Dawes Commission might not well be given, and whether it was practicable to hurry the work by which we could do away with this condition in the Indian Territory.

Now, it is easy to say that we can appropriate money from the Treasury to support orphan children in the Indian Territory. Yes, we can. It does not make any difference whether we have the right to do it; we have the power to do it, and it is a political power, and nobody can stop us if we want to do it.

But I want to say to my friend from Oklahoma that the legislative power of this Congress can be invoked, and in my judgment ought to be invoked, to take the trust fund that is piled up almost mountain high, in favor of and for the benefit of the Five Civilized Tribes, and the taxation that comes from royalty, and, if necessary, having plenary power in the premises, double or multiply by three or by four the taxation, if necessary, and devote it to the care and education of all the children in that Territory. They are quite able to bear the burden, and that is the proper way it should be met, and I believe that this committee, having power to submit the necessary legislation, can submit it to the House under the rules, and for one I will vote for it and do what I can to enact it.

But as one thing after another comes dropping along, and instead of applying the proper remedy it is proposed to take the funds from the Treasury, to last God knows for how long—I do not know—and to make an incentive to have it last longer than it otherwise would for the benefit of the very people that the gentleman's amendment refers to, as well as the conditions generally in the Territory, with every sympathy that every fair man ought to have for the weak and defenseless, I feel it to be the greatest kindness to all parties concerned that we should await the legislation enacted and not commence this method of support from the Treasury of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

Mr. FLYNN. Just one moment. I desire to disabuse the mind of the gentleman from Illinois of the idea that it was my desire to place him on record as making the point of order against this amendment. I frankly acknowledged that it was subject to a point of order. I presume if he had not made it, somebody else might have done so.

I realize fully the duty devolving upon the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. Nobody, personally, is a more kind friend and supporter of his than I am, but I am frank to acknowledge that by laches, perhaps, on my part, the amendment failed to be printed in the Indian appropriation bill. Then, in justice to myself and the cause, I felt compelled to offer it as an amendment. I find no fault with the gentleman from Illinois for making the point of order, simply because he does so under the rules. But I, of course, would like to see the amendment adopted. It is a worthy cause. I have also referred a similar bill to his committee. I realize the burdens that devolve upon him, and I hope and trust that he will remove from his mind the idea that I desired to place him in a position of objecting to this, because I dare say if he had not, a half dozen other people might.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having taken the chair, the Speaker announced his signature to an enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 2431. An act to present to the city of Nashville, State of Tennessee, the cannon on the gunboat Nashville from which was fired the first shot in the Spanish-American war.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session, Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts in the chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay to Lieut. Col. James F. Randlett, retired from the Army while serving as agent at the Uintah and Ouray Agency, Utah (as provided in 27 United States Statutes, page 120), for six months and twenty-three days, at the rate of $1,800 per annum, the sum of $1,015.

Mr. CANNON. I call the attention of the gentleman from New York to the fact that this item is a deficiency, and that it was referred regularly to the Committee on Appropriations by House Document No. 16. I think, perhaps, it would be better to go to the general deficiency bill, so that all matters of deficiency could stand together.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the gentleman is correct about that; but it was sent to us by a subsequent communication from the Indian Office, with the request that it be put in this bill. It does not properly belong here.

Mr. CANNON. Well, then, by consent, let it be stricken out.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well, Mr. Chairman; the gentleman does not raise the point of order, but simply asks unanimous consent that it go out.

Mr. CANNON. I do not want to raise the point of order, but I will if I have to. I will ask unanimous consent that the item may go out.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The Clerk read as follows:

SUPPORT OF SCHOOLS.

For support of Indian day and industrial schools, and for other educational purposes not hereinafter provided for, including pay of an architect, a draftsman, and a laborer, to be employed in the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, $1,200,000, of which amount the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, use $5,000 for the education of Indians in Alaska.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, on that part of the paragraph included in lines 9 and 10, providing for "pay of an architect, a draftsman, and a laborer, to be employed in the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs," I desire to make the point of order. I think that the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs will agree that it may be stricken out of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, it is identical with a provision that has been in the bill ever since the memory of man goeth not to the contrary; and I think it is entirely a proper provision in the bill. It would be proper also in the legislative bill, but it is not in the legislative bill, but is here.

Mr. HEMENWAY. It can not be proper for both bills. It belongs to the legislative bill, and I make the point of order for that reason—that it is not germane to this bill and ought not to be here. It is for the employment of "an architect, a draftsman, and a laborer, to be employed in the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs" in the city of Washington. That ought to be carried by the legislative bill, and for that reason it is not in order on this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Why, Mr. Chairman, I assume from the terms of the bill that it is for the employment of an architect and a draftsman at work on school buildings.

Mr. CURTIS. That is the object.

Mr. SHERMAN. And his work is done partly in the office and partly in the field. It is a provision which has been carried in the bill for quite a number of years. My recollection is that a point of order was raised against it a year ago, or two years ago, and, I think, overruled; and I think it was allowed to remain in the bill, if not by unanimous consent, why, upon a motion. Certainly the matter has been brought to the attention of the Committee of the Whole heretofore in the consideration of this bill, and the item has always remained in the bill.

So far as the point of order is concerned, I believe it is not tenable, unless it be in reference to the laborer only; and I do not think the point of order is sustainable against the proposition to employ an architect and draftsman to work upon school buildings, which is what this proposition is.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the appropriation made from the general fund in the Treasury or from some specific fund?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is made from the general fund in the Treasury for the education of Indian children. As shown, it is for the support of day and industrial schools, provided for from the general fund in the Treasury.

Mr. HEMENWAY. It is certainly a part of the clerical force employed in this city, and it specially provides that these parties are to be employed in the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. The office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is in Washington City. The only special reason I have for making the point of order is that I believe all these employees ought to be specifically provided for and draw salaries fixed by law. Under this appropriation their salaries may be fixed at any sum the Secretary of the Interior desires to fix. I think they ought to be carried by the legislative bill, and draw salaries provided for at a specific amount, so as not to leave the fixing of salaries at the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York made one statement that would have an important bearing. By a decision of the Speaker on an analogous point of order yesterday, that this had been carried from time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary in this bill, if the Chair were to make a decision at this time it would seem to the Chair that according to the division of jurisdiction made by the terms of the rule itself this item would belong to the legislative bill. But the Speaker, at the instance of the Committee on Appropriations, laid down a rule yesterday that in ascertaining the respective jurisdiction of the various committees the matter should be looked at historically, and that the identity of the bills when they were parted from the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations should be preserved.

Now, if it be true that this has always from that time to this been carried on the Indian appropriation bill, it seems to the Chair that the gentleman from Indiana would not contend, in view of yesterday's ruling, that his point of order was well taken.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I will state that if the appropriation was carried in the Indian bill when that bill was given to the Committee on Indian Affairs, then I would not insist upon the point of order. My understanding is that the items were not carried in the bill at that time, and have been put on since.

Mr. SHERMAN. In that the gentleman is correct. They were not carried in the Indian bill at the time the Indian bill was committed to the Indian Committee, but it has come in since. Perhaps I made a pretty strong statement in saying that it went back to a point from which the memory of man runneth not to the contrary. It has been in for several years, I can not say just how many years, but I have before me bills of the last three or four years, and it is contained in all of those bills.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me, without the words "including pay of architects," under general law this money could not be used to pay architects or laborers, because in 1885 or 1886 there was legislation that no one should be employed in any of the Departments in Washington unless specifically appropriated for or provided for, and therefore coming in, as I recollect it, within the last four or five years, these words have been carried in the Indian bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I find it in the bill as far back as 1895, and it has continued in each bill from that time down. But, Mr. Chairman, if the question is at all embarrassing to the Chair, and if the gentleman from Indiana will give me the same assurance that he gave in relation to an item on yesterday, that he will see that these officers are provided for in the legislative bill, I am willing these lines shall be stricken out.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I assure the gentleman that the matter will be looked into, and if they are necessary they will be appropriated for.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent——

Mr. SHERMAN. No, Mr. Chairman, I do not ask unanimous consent on that statement of the gentleman from Indiana. I ask for a ruling of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands this provision has been in the Indian bill since 1895, and there is no statement or evidence that it was in the bill before that time. Obviously it is within the scope of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. The Chair is quite familiar with that bill. It provides for all the executive civil service in the Departments at Washington and appropriates for the pay of all the employees of the class to which these in question belong in the greatest detail. For instance, it provides the appropriation for the employees in the Post-Office Department, in the Interior Department, and all other Departments, although other committees have more immediate contact with those Departments, and make the larger part of their appropriations. It seems perfectly clear to the Chair that upon the question as it is presented here, and with no older practice suggested than that suggested by the gentleman from New York——

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Chair will pardon me, I find it in the bill two or three years back of that; I find it in the act of 1898.

The CHAIRMAN. That would not modify the opinion of the Chair. It seems perfectly clear that from its nature the appropriation belongs to the committee that has charge of other like appropriations, and that there has been no settled practice which would prevail against the words of the rule defining the jurisdiction of the two committees. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. BURKE of Texas was recognized.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Will the gentleman from Texas permit me to offer an amendment reducing the total amount in this paragraph?

Mr. BURKE of Texas. Certainly, I will yield.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Then, Mr. Chairman, in line 11, page 45, I desire to offer the following amendment:

Strike out the word "two" and insert the word "one," and after the word "hundred" add "ninety six."

So that it will reduce the amount of the total $4,000, that being about the amount for the services of these clerks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana proposes an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 45, line 11, after the word "millions," strike out the word "two" and insert the word "one;" after the word "hundred" insert the words "ninety-six;" so that it will read "$1,196,000."

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I must oppose that amendment. It seems to me that in a great matter of this kind, involving an appropriation of $2,200,000, providing for the care and education of thousands of children——

Mr. HEMENWAY. Well, Mr. Chairman, I do not care anything about it. If the gentleman thinks this total amount ought to be left in, I will withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana may be withdrawn, if there be no objection.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. Mr. Chairman, it is with reluctance that I call the attention of the House to a system of education, sought to be enforced by the provisions on the next ten or fifteen pages, that in my judgment is wrong from any standpoint. I say this, Mr. Chairman, with reluctance, because my observation here has taught me one fact, if it has taught me anything, and that is that when a unanimous report comes from any committee in this House it is almost invariably adopted by the House, and I am willing to concede that that rule is right and proper; but while I recognize that fact, and while I recognize that according to every reasonable expectation the report of this committee will be adopted by the House, I wish to call the attention of the House and the country to some of the appropriations under the head of schools, or "Indian schools," which are sought to be established in this bill.

Mr. Chairman, there are 30 schools provided for under this head. In those schools provision is made for 6,230 children. The appropriation carried by this bill for the support and maintenance of those 30 schools and those 6,230 children amounts to the enormous sum of $1,797,117, an aggregate of more than $288 per child. I submit to this House that a parallel can not be found in any State, in any county, in any municipality within the limits of this Union to-day. Over $288 per capita for every child! I know that there is in this bill a provision limiting the actual expenditure to $167 per capita. That, I understand, relates alone to the support and sustenance and education, so to speak, of these children; the residue of the amount carried is for superintendents, physicians, blacksmiths, horticultural and agricultural employees, and everything of that kind, running up to $1,797,117, an aggregate, as I have stated, of over $288 per capita.

Why, Mr. Chairman, on page 49 of this bill there is an appropriation for the school at Hayward, Wis. That appropriation carries with it $309 a head for every child in that school—I mean the aggregate appropriation. There is another appropriation, on page 49, for a school at Kickapoo, Kans. That appropriation carries with it $306 per head for every child in that school. This includes the general appropriation. I do not propose to limit it to $167, because that would be manifestly unfair. Taking the whole appropriation covered by these various items and dividing it by the number of children in each school, and you will find the result agrees with the figures I have stated.

Mr. Chairman, we have in my own State a grand educational fund for the public free schools. We there distribute about $5 or $5.25 per capita for the support of the public schools of the State. The gentleman from Iowa whom I now see in his seat informs me that his State appropriates less than $5 per capita for the maintenance of the public schools.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended ten minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. BURKE of Texas. I thank the House, and I shall not abuse this courtesy. In the State of Iowa, as I was remarking, less than $5 per capita, according to my information, is appropriated for the sustenance and support of the free schools of that State. But here under the provisions of this bill, even according to the suggestion of the gentleman who has charge of it, including all other expenses for tuition and support of children, you appropriate $167 for the education of each Indian child.

Mr. Chairman, such legislation is unjust both to the Indian and to the taxpayers of this country. It is unjust to the Indian in that it tends to deprive him of that independence of character which is necessary for a proper standard of manhood, and makes him feel that he is an object of public charity. I notice, Mr. Chairman, that on page 54 of this bill there is appropriated $3,500 to build a house for the superintendent of the school there provided for, and I believe a salary of $1,800 is given him in addition.

Mr. Chairman, in going from the city of Washington to my home in the Southwest I pass through eight or ten States of this American Union. Through every one of them you can see on both sides of the railway the public school buildings—insignificant as most of them are. You can see the children out in the fields from early morning till late at night at work, endeavoring to aid their parents in maintaining themselves and those dependent upon them. These are they, Mr. Chairman, who are taxed in conjunction with the great manufacturing, mercantile, professional, and agricultural interests of the country—these are they who are taxed to extend these extraordinary privileges to the Indian children of this country. The children of Texas, as I have remarked, receive $5 per capita from the pockets of the citizens of Texas; the children of the Indians receive $288 per capita from the pockets of the American people.

I believe, sir, that such legislation as this ought not to be countenanced by the Congress of the United States. I believe that if known and understood throughout the length and breadth of this country it would receive the disapprobation of the American people. It is enough that we put these children upon the same level with our own children. Where is the necessity or justice of making these extraordinary appropriations to educate the Indian children of this country, when white children and the colored children, representing classes who pay the taxes to support these schools, receive not one-fiftieth part of the amount that we propose to appropriate for these Indian schools?

This is a system, Mr. Chairman, which has grown up in the manner which the chairman of the committee has suggested several times to-day. It is a system going back to the time "whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary," as he says. There is a certain legislative rut which we get into. It seems that all these committees follow the old ruts that have been marked out and followed for the past fifty years. I believe the time has come when the American people should do justice to themselves and at the same time do justice to the Indians by curtailing these extraordinary expenses sought now to be passed into law in behalf of the Indians of this country.

Sir, I thank the House for its courtesy in extending my time.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "Alaska," in line 14, page 45, insert the following:

"Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may make contracts with present contract schools for the education of Indian pupils during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, but shall only make such contracts at places where the Government has not provided school facilities for all the children of school age residing thereat, and to an extent not exceeding the number of children in attendance at certain contract schools at the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900."

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. I ask the gentleman to withhold his point of order.

Mr. LITTLE. I will reserve the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas reserves the point of order.

[Mr. FITZGERALD of New York addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired, under the leave given, and it now becomes necessary, under the rule, that the committee rise.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. I ask unanimous consent that when the committee resumes, I may be recognized to continue the discussion of this question.

Mr. SHERMAN. There will be no question but what the gentleman can have all the time he wishes to-morrow morning. I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the committee must now rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7433) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. FARIS, for one week, on account of important business.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire leave of absence from the night session to-night, on account of my physical condition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that he be excused from attendance at the night session, on account of his disability. Without objection, that request will be granted.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] will act as Speaker at the evening session. Under the rule, the House (at 5 o'clock) stands in recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order at 8 o'clock p. m. by Mr. LACEY, as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the rule under which this session is held.

The Clerk read as follows:

2. The House shall on each Friday at 5 o'clock p. m. take a recess until 8 o'clock, at which evening session private pension bills, bills for the removal of political disabilities, and bills removing charges of desertion only shall be considered; said evening session not to extend beyond 10 o'clock and 30 minutes.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, upon the threshold of entering our work for the evening, I desire to ask unanimous consent before we go into business along the line of pension legislation that I be allowed a few minutes to state my position upon the said business upon which we are about to enter—ten minutes, and possibly a little longer. I would like to make my position known and plain, as I made some remarks some days ago on the subject in discussing the pension appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and no doubt a satisfactory arrangement can be made.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I hope that time will be granted the gentleman from South Carolina.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from South Carolina be allowed ten minutes in which to present his views on the pension question.

There was no objection.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask that an extract from the Washington Star of February 1 be read from the Clerk's desk. I ask the Clerk to read it, headlines and all. It deserves all the prominence that anything can give to it.

The Clerk read as follows:

PENSION ORDER 164—EFFORT TO HAVE FORMER COMMISSIONER'S RULING RENEWED—COST OF PENSIONS GRANTED UNDER IT.

The members of the pension committee of the National Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, together with the commander in chief of the order, have been in Washington during the past week endeavoring to influence Congress sufficiently to have pension order 164 reinstated.

Order 164, which had its origin in the administration of Commissioner Raum, has been more talked about and has provoked more dissension among the old soldiers than any other rule that was ever issued by the Department. Although the rule was revoked the 27th of May, 1893, and was only in operation a little over three years, it costs the Government every year about $50,000,000 to satisfy the pensions which were issued under it.

It has been contended by those who are in a position to know that the reinstatement of this order, which is sought by the Grand Army of the Republic, would add to the pension appropriation at least $20,000,000, and it might go to $75,000,000 a year. It has been declared that order 164 was illegal; that it had no official sanction and should never have been put upon the pension books. During the time it was in operation it was the boast of the Department that 1,000 new certificates for pension were issued each day. It was during this period that the pension attorneys fattened their coffers, and it is argued this is one of the reasons why they are so earnest now in having this order reinstated.

Mr. TALBERT. And still another, Mr. Speaker. I would like to have the Clerk read the headlines and all. It is from the Philadelphia Press, edited, I think, if I am not mistaken, by a Cabinet officer, Postmaster-General Smith, who is now prominently mentioned as Vice-Presidential candidate on the Republican ticket this year.

The Clerk read as follows:

HUGE PENSION GRAB IN CONTEMPLATION—SENATOR CULLOM INTRODUCES A BILL TO MAKE PENSIONABLE ALL MILITIAMEN WHO SERVED IN ARMY OR NAVY FOR SIXTY DAYS—WOULD COST $30,000,000 A YEAR.

[Special dispatch to The Press.]

WASHINGTON, January 27, 1900.

The bills for increasing the pension rolls continue to accumulate. In addition to those putting all the survivors and surviving widows of Indian wars upon the rolls, there is now a proposition to include as pensionable all members of militia organizations who served sixty days in the Army and Navy of the United States. This bill was introduced by Mr. CULLOM, of Illinois, who also introduced one which would have had the effect of making deserters pensionable. He disowned the latter after its true character had been exposed.

EVANS SHOWS THE COST.

Commissioner of Pensions Evans had, by request of the Senate committee, furnished a report on this Cullom bill for pensioning members of the militia companies. He protested against further increases in the pension list in this general way, and in showing the effect of the bill, says:

"It is safe to assume that from 50,000 to 100,000 cases would receive favorable action each year under the operations of this bill, and that the annual value of the pension roll, after making due allowance, would be increased by at least $20,000,000 each year for the next ten or fifteen years.

"It is very difficult to reach a correct estimate as to the probable cost of this bill if enacted into law, as we do not have very definite information as to the total number and strength of the many militia organizations who served with the Army during the war of the rebellion and the other wars in which the United States has been engaged, but it is certain that this class of beneficiaries would be very numerous.

"The greatest objection to this kind of legislation is that it does not discriminate in any way between the soldier or sailor who bore the heat and burden of the day, who was almost constantly for years exposed to the hardship and dangers of active warfare, and those who rendered no service at the front and who were never exposed even to the ordinary dangers of an active military campaign.

INJUSTICE OF THE BILL.

"Take, for instance, the cases of the militia organizations of the different States, many of which served under the command of a United States officer for more than sixty days, and yet very few of them ever left their States or were exposed to any hardships, except those ordinarily incident to a summer encampment. I apprehend that many of these troops would be included in the bill, and it would appear almost unnecessary to discuss the inequality between their services and those who rendered service at the front for three or four long years in active campaign.

"I fail to see any good reason for extending the provisions of the present liberal pension laws in this general way, and I do not believe that the legislation proposed by this bill is in any way justified, for the reasons stated."

Mr. TALBERT. Now, Mr. Speaker, in view of these facts and the fact that we are engaged in a war at this time and the pension roll is increasing day after day, I want to say that now and henceforth I shall insist upon a quorum of this House when pension bills are under consideration at the special Friday evening sessions. I want further to say that I have no apology to offer to anybody or to any party in taking this position. I take it now, and it is my avowed determination to stand up to it.

I give timely notice, and I mean it, that so long as I may be able to drag myself to the Capitol, no pension bill—and there is no qualification to this ultimatum—shall pass this House unless a quorum of the members are present. The abuse must stop. It ought to stop. Innocent people will be hurt, possibly, but that will only accentuate the responsibility; and let all the responsibility rest upon those who will not come out to see that justice is done the old soldier.

If legislation to meet exceptional cases is impossible or impracticable, the claims should be treated as other claims are treated. This sort of legislation should be considered as other legislation is considered and acted upon in the light of investigation. So far as I can effect it, Mr. Speaker, hereafter the rules shall be inexorably applied. I demand a quorum. If the House is without a quorum, I shall ask an immediate adjournment. If that is refused, I shall insist that the House exhaust its power to secure a quorum.

It is in the power of this Congress, Mr. Speaker, to restore and legalize order 164. If they want to do it, let them do it. There are enough Republican votes in this Congress to pass the Cullom bill or any bill as iniquitous as it is. Do it, and take the responsibility. It is a Presidential year, and if I have read the signs of the times aright the Republican party will need every vote it can muster or buy to make even a decent showing on the election-night bulletin boards next November.

I want to say, as I have often said, that I make no captious opposition to pension legislation. My record in the past will show that. But I believe in my heart of hearts that the pension laws of this country are sufficiently liberal to grant a pension to every deserving soldier or his widow, and I am absolutely opposed to coming here Friday night after Friday night and sitting here as a court of appeals where these people can come and get special legislation without even a single affidavit, where they have been refused by the Pension Bureau, where they ought to go to get their pensions. Now, then, if you insist upon this pension legislation, the rules of the House require that you do it with a quorum. The Constitution of the United States requires that you have a quorum to do business, and I am only acting in the capacity of the rules and law and Constitution in demanding that you do have a quorum if you insist upon passing this legislation.

Look now at the thin House here. They cry aloud about their love for the old soldier, and yet they are not giving up their pink teas and poker and all that sort of thing in order to come here to vote to give pensions to soldiers. I believe the claims ought to be considered, and not be hurried through the House, and a member be hooted at here at any time when asking information by gentlemen who cry "Vote! Vote!" I am tired of it. I shall demand a quorum shall be present hereafter; and in doing this I am not opposed to liberal pension laws. The general laws are sufficiently liberal to do away with so much special legislation in regard to pensions. I hope I may not be misunderstood.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of considering bills on the Private Calendar under the rule just read.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TALBERT) there were 86 in the affirmative and none in the negative.

Mr. TALBERT. I make the point, Mr. Speaker, that there is no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina makes the point that there is no quorum. The Chair will count the House. [After having counted the House.] Eighty-eight members present; not a quorum.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I think we had better have a call of the House.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will withdraw that for a moment; he has taken all the time that has been occupied. We can not do anything else under the position he has taken except to make a few speeches, and let us make some speeches.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will call the roll.

During the call of the House the following occurred:

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I notice members are answering "present." Is not this a pending question whether we go into Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The call of the House is in progress, and the members will answer "present."

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, is it not proper to vote on the pending motion?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is no pending motion. The rule does not apply to Friday night sessions.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. Is not the motion before the House to go into Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it not a proper answer to the roll call, either "aye" or "no?"

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not. The rule which the gentleman has in mind has a special exception. That rule which calls for a vote during the call of the House says it shall not apply to Friday night sessions. The rule so provides.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It seems that we have one rule for the day and another rule for the night. [Laughter.]

After the call of the House was completed,

Mr. TALBERT. If it is in order now, Mr. Speaker, I again renew my motion to adjourn rather than have to send out for the friends of these people. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. DRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, I trust that the gentleman will withdraw that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can not recognize gentlemen until after the call of the roll is announced. One hundred and twelve members are present—not a quorum.

Mr. DE GRAFFENREID. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the notice given by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] was not understood by the House before this evening session, I trust he will now withdraw his obstructive proceedings and renew them at a subsequent meeting.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It can not be withdrawn. The absence of a quorum has been disclosed. The motion to adjourn has been made and lost, and a call of the House has been ordered, and the record shows that there are present only 112 members.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I would like the attention of members just a moment. The gentleman has availed himself of his constitutional right to demand that a quorum shall be present. As one I am sorry that he has done so, and yet I do not feel like quarreling with him for doing it. As a member of the House, I do not know that we have a right to say that any gentleman has done a wrong, although we may be very anxious for something else, if he is within the rules of the House. He is within the rules, and therefore I am not going to criticise the gentleman; but I want to say this: As a member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions I have put in over four hours two days of every week in the examination of these pension bills. I want to say to the gentleman from South Carolina that there is no danger, there is no possibility of this committee, as it is now organized, ever reporting in favor of the Cullom bill should it come from the Senate of the United States. I want to say to you and to the House that the Committee on Invalid Pensions has most carefully scrutinized every bill, and I am ready to agree with the gentleman from South Carolina or any other gentleman that if there was any lax legislation on this subject then we ought to cry halt.

We have not done any reckless legislation; the committee has not recommended any, but has worked long and faithfully to present a few meritorious bills. I venture the assertion that no Calendar has ever presented bills that were more meritorious than this one, and we invite a careful consideration. The old soldier is entitled to a good deal of sympathy, but we are not asking sympathy; it is justice we demand as right.

But, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, on this Calendar are about forty bills. The majority of them are most meritorious. Let me illustrate by referring to a particular case, that of an old soldier 56 years of age, who in 1861 was a little less than 15 years old, who went into the Army and expended four years and about six months fighting for a united country—fighting for the old flag. He has no means.

He is to-day drawing a pension of only $6 a month, notwithstanding the fact that one of his eyes is entirely out, notwithstanding his diseased lung, notwithstanding his impaired heart; he is drawing the pitiful sum of $6 per month because he is unable to go back and prove that these various disabilities were the result of his army service. The bill on the Calendar proposes to give this old soldier the pitiful pension of $12 a month, and the want of a quorum of members prevents it. It is a shame.

Another bill on the Calendar will illustrate the class of cases which this House is asked to consider. That is the case of a war widow, a woman who, as I happen to know, stayed at home while her husband was in the Army, where he gave up his life. His lifeless body was brought home to her. She had four little children. She went into the hay field and pitched hay; she went into the field and plowed corn; she went out into the field and carried in wood from the snow-covered ground to warm those little children, while the husband was away fighting the battles of his country, the benefits of which we are now enjoying. Unfortunately, four years after the war was over, she was overtaken by a man and married him. He died a few years ago.

Now that mother is homeless and penniless; she is on the road to the poorhouse. We ask that this House give her a pension of $12 a month. These bills will illustrate the class of cases which are on this Calendar demanding action in this House.

If the gentleman from South Carolina insists, as he has the right to do, upon the attendance of a constitutional majority, I ask members of this House who have not put upon these bills the time that some of the rest of us have in the committee room—I ask you whether or not next Friday night we shall have the same occurrence as to-night—a sparse attendance—or whether we shall have the presence of a constitutional majority?

A MEMBER. You should talk to the fellows who are not here.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Yes; the gentleman is correct. Those are the men I want to reach. That is the reason I am doing this talking. I want it understood that when they go around, as many of them will do, professing to be the friends of the old soldier and the soldiers' widows, I want it understood that they are not here to-night to vote, and many of them are never here to aid the old soldier, yet ever ready to profess friendship for the old soldier when it costs him no inconvenience.

Let me say now that I am proud of the members who are here to-night. There are more members present than I have ever seen here on the occasion of a Friday night meeting. But when a constitutional majority is insisted upon, will those members who have stayed away to-night be here next Friday night? If not here, they should be brought by the Sergeant-at-Arms. If they are the friends of the old soldier, and want to see justice done where the ordinary law can not give it, or has not given it, I hope they will be here; and if they are not here, I hope the roll call will show that fact. And not only that, but I hope that every member of this House who has not a good excuse for not being here next Friday night to act on these bills and to vote in favor of the meritorious ones, will not go round parading as the friend of the soldier, but will be marked down as his enemy. [Applause.]

These meetings are a part of the business of the House. The old soldiers have been crowded out of the day sessions and these night sessions set apart to consider pension claims, and this is the time when members can do something for the old soldier. The old soldiers have the right to expect the presence of their friends, and I demand that the member who is the professed friend of the soldier show up or take the consequence of his absence. It is now a condition that confronts, and not a theory. We mean business, and will not be content until we pass some of these meritorious bills; and if we do not, the country shall know whose fault it is. [Applause.]

Mr. GAINES. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana a question. We all know him, and we know that he speaks exactly what he believes to be true.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Thank you.

Mr. GAINES. The gentleman seems to know the merits of these claims.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I believe I do, for I have investigated them.

Mr. GAINES. Now, does not the gentleman, believing as he does, feel that he ought to be here next Friday night and insist on sending the Sergeant-at-Arms after members who do not choose to attend? If I knew the facts of these cases as the gentleman appears to know them, that is what I would do.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I will join any other members who may be here in insisting on a roll call and on sending the Sergeant-at-Arms to bring members here to vote.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I do not understand that the motion now before the House is debatable.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is no motion before the House.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Then I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. If the gentleman who insisted upon the vote of a quorum on the motion to go into Committee of the Whole—desiring, as I understand, that there should be only the usual business quorum, the roll call having developed that there is present a quorum of the Committee of the Whole—if the member who has made the point should now be willing to withdraw it, is it not perfectly competent to expunge by unanimous consent the record which has been made?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. GAINES. I would not agree to that; I will say that right now, though I am as willing as any other man to stay here to-night and work.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The record shows that there is not a quorum of the House present. Until a quorum is disclosed the House can take no action except to adjourn or to adopt measures for securing the attendance of a quorum.

Mr. GAINES. Regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to adjourn.

The question was put.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The ayes appear to have it.

Several MEMBERS. Division!

Mr. RIDGELY. Mr. Speaker, a question, pending the vote.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 48, noes 46.

Mr. GRIGGS, Mr. NORTON of Ohio, and others demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 24, nays 89, answered "present" 4, not voting 237; as follows:

So the motion to adjourn was rejected.

Mr. MERCER (having previously voted in the negative). Mr. Speaker, I have just been informed that a good many members were not aware that we were to have a meeting to-night, and, that being so, I desire to change my vote from "no" to "aye."

The Clerk having called Mr. MERCER's name, he voted "aye."

Mr. DRIGGS. I desire to say that I am paired with the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN], and I desire to withdraw my vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's vote will be withdrawn.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, my colleague [Mr. GROSVENOR] is ill, and asked me to state that fact to the House, and to request that he be excused.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

Mr. BARNEY. I am paired with the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. ALLEN, and he not being present, I withdraw my vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The vote will be withdrawn.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I want that pair to show that it is the gentleman from New Hampshire, Mr. CLARKE, who is absent, and not myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the pair so shows.

Mr. MCDOWELL. I observe that I am paired with the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. BROMWELL, and I wish to withdraw my vote and be recorded as "present."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's vote will be withdrawn.

Mr. LINNEY. I understood the Clerk to announce that I am paired with my colleague, Mr. BELLAMY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Both gentlemen are present.

Mr. LINNEY. Then I will allow my vote to stand.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer for adoption the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms take into custody and bring to the bar of the House such of its members as are absent without leave.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does not that order come automatically?

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. No; it requires the resolution at a Friday night session.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is that a night rule or a day rule? [Laughter.]

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MAHON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio and others demanded a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 62, noes 35.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio and others demanded the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Twenty-two members have risen in support of the demand for the yeas and nays—a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are ordered.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I should like to know what basis is to be taken in determining the demand for the yeas and nays. The roll call shows 117, and there were not one-fifth of that number who voted for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It requires one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. One-fifth of the rising vote?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. One-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. DRIGGS. As I understand, there were 97 on the last vote. One-fifth of that is 19, and there were 23, or more than one-fifth, who voted for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The last vote was 97.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Twenty would be a sufficient number.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, does it have to be one-fifth of those present or one-fifth of those voting?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. One-fifth of the last vote. The other side might have been called for, and it was not called for.

Mr. MERCER. Is it proper now to call for the other side?

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is demanded, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 29, nays 84, not voting 241; as follows:

So the House refused to adjourn.

The following additional pairs were announced:

For this day:

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey with Mr. HENRY of Texas.

Mr. HULL with Mr. MCALEER.

Mr. MCPHERSON with Mr. COOPER of Texas.

Mr. HEPBURN with Mr. DAVIS.

Mr. JOY with Mr. BURKE of Texas.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. TALBERT. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TALBERT. In view of the fact that a good many members have come to me and said that they did not understand that I had given notice and that it is not generally known, while I stated two weeks ago that I would pursue this course; in view of the fact that I do not want to put any indignity upon members by having them brought in here from their beds, I ask if it would not be in order to withdraw the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. TALBERT. My parliamentary inquiry is if I can not withdraw the point of no quorum.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask, as a parliamentary inquiry, what has become of the resolution offered by me a short time ago?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The resolution has been adopted.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Do I understand, then, that the order has been given to send out the Sergeant-at-Arms to bring in absent members?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has just signed the necessary warrants.

Mr. NORTON of Ohio. Now, Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that it will be utterly impossible for the order to be executed before the hour expires, I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The question was taken, and the motion was disagreed to.

Mr. HILL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that no business has intervened since the last motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point. There has been intervening business.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I am still on the anxious bench. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Connecticut moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Several MEMBERS. Division!

The House divided; and there were—ayes 51, noes 32.

Mr. BARNEY and others. The yeas and nays.

The question was taken, and the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. A parliamentary inquiry. Would it be in order to ask unanimous consent at this time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House is dividing on the motion to adjourn.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is called for.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 33, nays 80, answered "present" 3; not voting 233; as follows:

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read, corrected, and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I understand that there is a special order that eulogies on the late Mr. ERMENTROUT, of Pennsylvania, shall begin at 1 o'clock to-day. I ask unanimous consent that the order be modified so as to provide that the eulogies be taken up immediately on the completion of the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the special order set for 1 o'clock be so modified that it be taken up immediately after the completion of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman who has the eulogies more especially in charge is not now in his seat. I think he would object to any modification if he was present.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think a half or three-quarters of an hour after 1 will be sufficient to complete the appropriation bill. The messenger, however, tells me, Mr. Speaker, that I am in error when I say that any time was fixed for eulogies.

The SPEAKER. The Calendar is incorrect. The Journal shows that the eulogies were set for not later than 1 o'clock.

Mr. SHERMAN. My colleague suggests that I so modify my request that the eulogies shall be taken up not later than 2 o'clock.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I was about to make that suggestion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York modifies his request that the special order be postponed not later than 2 o'clock.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, unless that is absolutely necessary, I hope it will not be done, as it may inconvenience some of the speakers. The speaker who precedes me, Mr. BROSIUS of Pennsylvania, finds it necessary to leave early for his home. And Mr. ZIEGLER, also from Pennsylvania, states that he must leave by 3 o'clock.

Mr. BROSIUS. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I shall be here at whatever time it is necessary.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 6272. An act fixing the salary of the postmaster at Washington City, D. C.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts in the chair) for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7433) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] be permitted to proceed without interruption for twenty minutes. The gentleman is a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs and has not heretofore occupied any time.

There was no objection.

[Mr. FITZGERALD of New York addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I do not contemplate entering into a general discussion upon this question, but I feel that the importance of it is sufficient to demand at least a passing attention.

The Committee on Indian Affairs have allowed every dollar in the appropriation bill that has been called for by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. I would like those members of the House who have not had occasion to investigate the question to know that in this school service there are three separate lines of schools under Government supervision absolutely—the reservation day school, the reservation boarding school, and the nonreservation boarding school. In addition to that, Indian children are sent to the free schools in the adjoining States where they are so situated that this can be done.

Now, the Indian Commissioner states in his report, without any qualification, that the reservation boarding schools are ample for all requirements. I will quote his exact language:

> The present number of reservation schools is sufficient to meet all the requirements of the service, but they should be enlarged in some cases and better equipped in others.

Provision has been made for the children in our contract schools, of which we hear so much. The 2,000 people referred to are distributed in about 17 different States and about 25 different schools. I do not believe that there is any necessity, even if it were a proper appropriation, I do not believe that there is the slightest necessity, for continuing this provision.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. LITTLE. Why, certainly, though I did not interrupt the gentleman in his remarks.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. I would like to ask the gentleman if he will explain to the committee where the Commissioner of Indian Affairs will put the 2,000 pupils in these schools?

Mr. LITTLE. If the gentleman will ask the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, he will get all the information in detail. The Commissioner states that the school provisions in the reservation boarding schools are ample and sufficient when the necessary repairs and improvements are made.

This is no new proposition. Five years ago Congress determined upon a settled policy that appropriations to sectarian schools should cease at the end of five years—a wise policy, I have no doubt. That policy, I do know, Mr. Chairman, met the unconditional approval of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and there is no recommendation in any part of his report or that of the Secretary of the Interior asking an extension of this service. Now, the boarding schools have sufficient capacity. These 2,000 pupils are scattered in 17 different States. They can be cared for in the Government schools or they can go to the common free schools in the States in the various school districts in the States where these Indians are situated.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. I ask the gentleman, Does not the Commissioner say that it has been a failure to attempt to introduce them into the free schools?

Mr. LITTLE. He says it has not been such a success as was hoped.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. And he has been doing it for about seven years?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes, sir; but he states that he has ample provision even though the success has been less than he had hoped it would be.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me read a provision in the last appropriation bill:

> Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may make contracts with contract schools, apportioning as near as may be the amount so contracted for among schools of various denominations, for the education of Indian pupils during the fiscal year 1900, but shall only make such contracts at places where nonsectarian schools can not be provided for such Indian children, and to an amount not exceeding 15 per cent of the amount so used for the fiscal year 1895, the same to be divided proportionately among the said several contract schools, this being the final appropriation for sectarian schools.

It was a simple declaration of the policy that had been declared by Congress five years ago. During the last Congress I remember it was claimed that by a mistake the amount formerly contemplated had not been given the schools, and therefore this additional appropriation was given by the last Congress, with the announcement that this should end this service.

These schools have had five years' notice of the policy of the Government, that the Congress in its wisdom—and I might say without reference to its political division of opinion—declared by its action, formal and deliberate, that they deemed it unwise that the public moneys of the Government should be appropriated to sectarian schools, and that the policy in the education of Indian children should be under the direct control not only of the Government, but of Government officers, and that the public money of the Government should only be expended by its public officers responsible to it for their conduct. All appreciate the good that sectarian schools have done in these reservations for the upbuilding of these Indians; but, Mr. Chairman, there is another class of these schools, known as the mission schools—schools absolutely supported by the churches, supported by charities—that do not ask any assistance of Congress. They have had at all times and will have at all times in the future, without regard to their denominational caste, all the opportunities that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs can afford them for the execution of their benevolent purposes.

Why, sir, I find that in the last five years these sectarian, benevolent, and charitable schools have increased from some 700 to more than 1,200 pupils during the present year, and if the benevolent people of this country want to engage in this work and put into it their extra means, we all say, "God bless you! Go ahead without regard to your denominational tendency." But we do say, and I intend so far as I am concerned, that it shall be the settled policy of this Government, that not one dollar of the public moneys of this country shall be expended to perpetuate sectarian schools; not one dollar of the public moneys shall be used for sectarian purposes; that there shall be a complete separation of church and state, which is the surest guaranty of religious liberty and of the future harmony of our great church organizations, which have in their keeping the great moral and eternal future of the people.

I believe these appropriations are now and always have been a detriment to the public service. It has been a source of constant friction and constant confusion, and that friction has not only reached the reservation, but it has reached the Congress—reached, I might say, the political parties of the country—and after the most mature deliberation, I believe without any prejudice on the part of Congress toward any denomination, it settled upon this determinate policy, that the public money should be appropriated only to public institutions for the education of these people.

I remember that on my advent into Congress, during the last session of the Fifty-third Congress, Congress for the two years appropriated over $19,000,000 for the Indian schools and Indian service. Now it is reduced to a little over fourteen million during the two years, a reduction having been made of more than $4,000,000. That reduction has been made upon the lines of policy indicated, and that is, that the public moneys can be more economically administered by the officers of the Government than it can be by placing it in the hands of any sect to be administered by them. If the charities want to go hand in hand with the Government, I assure my friend from New York and the friends of sectarian schools that if they want to go on the reservation as they want to go to India, China, the Philippines, or elsewhere, to spend their money and means in the enlightenment of mankind, the Indian service will welcome them and give them all the encouragement they wish.

Let the great charities go on hand in hand; but let the Government adhere to its ancient policy that the public money can only be expended through the public functionaries of the Government, and it will prove to be not only a blessing to the churches of the country, but a blessing to the public service, and at last a fundamental blessing to the Indian children that it is sought to advance in civilization. It has been my constant effort to reduce the large expenses as rapidly as possible, and it shall continue to be my effort during my public service here. There has been over four millions reduction in this expenditure, notwithstanding the vast amount we are compelled to expend in discharge of treaty obligations made in past years. I believe the point of order should be sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment to this section which authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to expend the appropriation under contracts with the present contract schools, with certain limitations upon his power not necessary to state.

The gentleman from Arkansas makes the point of order against that amendment under Rule XXI, and, if the Chair understands him correctly, under the last clause of that rule, which is as follows:

> Nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to interrupt the Chair, but I would like to call the Chair's attention to one decision before the Chair rules.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. In the Fifty-fifth Congress the Post-Office appropriation bill was under consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The Chair will find it on page 229 of Hinds's Digest. The paragraph having been read from that bill, for transportation by mail by pneumatic tube, $225,000, the point of order was made that there was no law authorizing such an appropriation, and it was held that, the Postmaster-General having authority to transmit the mails generally, an amendment like that was a limitation upon the general power.

Now, section 463 of the Revised Statutes provides that—

> The Commissioner of Indian Affairs shall, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, and agreeably to such regulations as the President may prescribe, have the management of all Indian affairs and of all matters arising out of Indian relations.

The rule has been promulgated for Indian schools and services under this section by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, which has the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman refer to the decision made by Mr. PAYNE, the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House?

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. Yes. I refer to the decision on page 229 of the Digest, section 514. I call the attention of the Chair to section 463 of the Revised Statutes, which I have just read, and under that provision regulations governing the Indian schools have been issued by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and approved by the Secretary of the Interior, and I think this amendment is on all fours with the case there cited.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair regrets that the gentleman from New York did not call his attention to the authority before, but will consider the effect of that authority in the decision which he is about to give. The question presented is not one of policy, but one of parliamentary law. The legislation with reference to the particular schools began in the Fifty-fourth Congress. The Chair thinks that it is agreed that the contract schools are sectarian schools. In the Fifty-fourth Congress, first session, the Indian appropriation act contains this language:

> It is hereby declared to be the settled policy of the Government to hereafter make no appropriation whatever for education in any sectarian school.

The act then proceeds to make an appropriation for contract schools in an amount not exceeding 50 per cent of the amount used for the preceding fiscal year. The next Indian appropriation act, in the second session of the Fifty-fourth Congress, contains the same language with regard to the policy of the Government, and makes an appropriation for the contract schools in an amount not exceeding 40 per cent of the amount used in the fiscal year 1895. Again, the appropriation act passed at the first session of the Fifty-fifth Congress contains an appropriation for contract schools in an amount not to exceed 30 per cent of the amount so used in the fiscal year 1895. The appropriation act of the third session of the Fifty-fifth Congress makes an appropriation for contract schools in an amount not exceeding 15 per cent of the amount so used in the fiscal year 1899, and concludes with this language:

> This being the final appropriation for sectarian schools.

What does that language mean, taken in connection with the declaration of policy in the first session of the Fifty-fourth Congress and the action of successive Congresses in reducing the amount of appropriation for that purpose? It seems very clear to the Chair—and he has given most careful attention to this question—that in effect it is a law forbidding appropriations for that purpose. In effect it is as if Congress had passed a separate act in substantially these terms:

> Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter there shall be no appropriations for sectarian schools for the Indians.

The language which Congress has used must be given some meaning. It is not to be supposed that it was a mere stump speech injected into the body of the statute. What meaning can the language which has been recited have except a meaning which will forbid such appropriations in the future? The Chair thinks it has that meaning.

Now, some gentleman may say, "One Congress can not bind another Congress." That is true. A Congress can not even bind itself. A Congress may enact a law to-day and repeal it to-morrow. But that law can not be repealed upon a general appropriation bill, under the rules of this House. It is clearly within the power of the House, upon the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs, in a suitable legislative bill to repeal the provision of law which is now upon the statute books; but it is not within the power of that committee, under our rules, to report in a general appropriation bill a provision repealing that law; nor is it in the power of the House to repeal the law by an amendment to a general appropriation bill. No legislation, whether it is good or bad legislation, is in order on such a bill.

Therefore, it seems clear, if the reasoning of the Chair is correct on this point, that the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York is in effect a repeal for one year—and that is a repeal pro tanto—of a provision of existing law.

The gentleman from New York cites to the Chair a decision in regard to pneumatic-tube service. The Chair recalls very well that in the last Post-Office appropriation bill there was enacted a provision in effect similar to that contained in the Indian appropriation bill—that hereafter there shall be no appropriation or no contract for pneumatic-tube service. The Chair remembers very well that the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] at that time pointed out to the House that if that provision were made a law, the House thereafter, under its rules, could make no such appropriation, while the Senate, under its rules, could do so—conceding, apparently, that a point of order would lie against an appropriation in the House for the further continuance of the pneumatic-tube service. That was the understanding of the Chair, as an individual member of the House, at that time; and it is his understanding now. The question raised here is not the question raised in the precedent cited by the gentleman from New York, but would be the question raised if upon the coming Post-Office appropriation bill an amendment were offered, against the provisions of law, to appropriate further for pneumatic-tube service.

The Chair is sustained by an authority created in the last session of the last Congress. The Chair in his own mind had come to the conclusion which he has announced before learning of this precedent. It is well, perhaps, to state it carefully. The law existing at the time of this precedent was as follows:

From and after the 30th of June, 1898, no money appropriated for charitable purposes in the District of Columbia shall be paid to any church or religious denomination or to any institution or society which is under sectarian or ecclesiastical control.

That in effect, although not in language, is the provision that is now law with regard to contract schools. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] on the 13th of December, 1898, offered an amendment to the District of Columbia appropriation bill providing for an appropriation for the St. Joseph Asylum. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] made the point of order under Rule XXI. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] was in the chair, and after some discussion sustained the point of order.

The Chair thinks that this precedent is exactly in point. It confirms his views which were formed by reading the provisions of the successive Indian appropriation bills. The Chair thinks that the amendment of the gentleman from New York would change existing law, and is therefore obnoxious to the point of order made by the gentleman from Arkansas, which is accordingly sustained.

The Clerk will read.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. I was about to call the attention of the Chair, before the Chair ruled, to the historical argument in favor of the amendment. I understood I was to have an opportunity to do so; but I do not care to continue this discussion at this hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not intend to cut the gentleman off. The Chair supposed that the gentleman from New York had brought to his attention everything that he desired to call attention to.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. I fully understand that the Chair did not intend any discourtesy toward me.

The CHAIRMAN. If there should have seemed to be such, the Chair would certainly apologize to the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. I understand that in the previous acts, which I intended to cite, there were certain provisions which, I think, if read might have changed the view of the Chair. And this declaration of last year's appropriation bill can hardly, in my humble opinion, be taken as establishing a declaration of policy when it has been ingrafted upon some laws and left out of succeeding laws. It is obvious that you can not make a declaration of policy by law one year and then declare a different policy the next year.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York had the opportunity of making that argument before the Chair ruled.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. I am well aware that the Chair has not intended any discourtesy, and I do not wish to reflect upon him in the least.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the education of the noncitizen children in the Indian Territory, the sum of $75,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CANNON. I make a point of order upon the paragraph just read, that it proposes to make an appropriation not authorized by any law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would ask the gentleman from New York if there is any education of the noncitizen children in the Indian Territory now going on?

Mr. SHERMAN. There is not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair entertains no doubt about the question.

Mr. LITTLE. I was just going to state to the Chair that I think there is no question but that the point of order is well taken. I agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] in that, that it is subject to the point of order. I shall not contest that.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 45, following line 14, insert the following:

"The Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to issue rules and regulations governing schools in the Cherokee, Creek, Choctaw, and Chickasaw Nations in the Indian Territory, to appoint such officers, teachers, and employees as in his judgment shall be necessary to the establishment and maintenance of good and efficient schools in said nation, and to pay said officers, teachers, and employees for their services, and other necessary expenses of said schools, from the funds of said nation."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment, providing that the teachers in said schools shall be selected upon merit, and that their selection shall be nonpartisan—that is, without reference to their politics.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment to the amendment, offered by the gentleman from Arkansas, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of the proposed amendment the words, "Provided, That in the selection of teachers merit only shall be considered."

Mr. CURTIS. We have no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment of Mr. CURTIS as amended was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and education of 150 Indian pupils at the Indian school at Carson City, Nev., $25,050; for pay of superintendent at said school, $1,500; for general repairs and improvements, $1,000; for erection of shops, $3,000; in all, $30,550.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I offer the following amendment to this section.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 3, page 47, strike out "one hundred and fifty" and insert "two hundred;" line 5, page 47, strike out "twenty-five thousand and fifty" and insert "thirty-three thousand four hundred;" line 7, page 47, strike out "one" and insert "three;" lines 8 and 9, page 47, strike out "thirty thousand five hundred and fifty" and insert "forty thousand nine hundred."

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. Chairman, I will state that I have submitted this amendment to the chairman of the committee [Mr. SHERMAN] and that he acquiesces in it.

This amendment is intended to secure a total additional appropriation of $10,000, intended to cover 50 additional pupils at this school. I will state in this connection that in last year's appropriation bill an enlargement of the school was made for the purpose of accommodating this additional number of pupils, but inadvertently, in the appropriation bill, the number of pupils provided was left the same as last year, leaving out of consideration the fact that the accommodations had been increased for the purpose of meeting the demands of this increased number.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, just a word. It was not through inadvertence of the committee that the number of pupils was left unchanged. It was because in framing the bill we followed the original estimate submitted by the Treasury. It was by inadvertence at the Interior Department that the amount was not changed. As a matter of fact, we appropriated $10,000 for the additional building there last year. The actual enrollment was 186. There is ample accommodation now for the 200 pupils, and they ought to have the additional appropriation. I think the gentleman's amendment ought to be adopted.

The amendment of Mr. NEWLANDS was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and education of 250 Indian pupils at Indian school, Fort Totten, N. Dak., $41,750; for pay of superintendent at said school, $1,600; for sewerage system, $2,500; for general repairs and improvements, $5,000; in all, $50,850.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to line 16, page 48, which I ask the Clerk to read.

Insert at the end of line 16, page 48, the following:

"That the sum of $5,000, appropriated for steam heating, and the sum of $1,800, appropriated for electric light plant at the Fort Totten, N. Dak., Indian school by the Indian appropriation act for the fiscal year 1900, is hereby reappropriated and made available during the fiscal year 1901."

Mr. SHERMAN. That is all right.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Chairman, the reason for this amendment is the fact that after the appropriation for this purpose was made last year there was so short a time left that the authorities have been unable to complete the work, and it is necessary to reappropriate the money, so that the funds may be available after the end of the present fiscal year. The school is a large one, with extensive buildings. At present it is only heated by stoves and has no facilities for lighting except by lamps. These improvements are material and necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the support and education of 125 pupils at the Indian school at Hayward, Wis., $20,875; pay of superintendent, $1,300; general repairs and improvements, $1,500; for the erection of a new school building, $15,000; in all, $38,675.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to that section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in line 6, page 49, the word "erection" and insert in lieu thereof the word "completion."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For collection and transportation of pupils to and from Indian schools, and also for the transportation of Indian pupils from all the Indian schools and placing of them, with the consent of their parents, under the care and control of such suitable white families as may in all respects be qualified to give such pupils moral, industrial, and educational training, under arrangements in which their proper care, support, and education shall be in exchange for their labor, $35,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 5, page 55, after the word "dollars" add "That wherever there are trust funds in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of, or moneys due under treaties or other agreements, any tribe or band of Indians, the principal of which or any portion thereof, or the interest on which or any portion thereof, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized by law, in his discretion, to use for the benefit of said Indians, and the parents or guardians of any children entitled to the benefit of such funds shall make choice of a school or schools where they desire their children or wards to be educated, then, and in that event, if in his judgment such schools are proper institutions in which to educate their children, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to use said funds so belonging to said Indians and set aside for their benefit to pay the expenses, or any part of the expenses, of educating said children in the schools so chosen by said parents or guardians."

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is clearly legislation.

Mr. LITTLE. I think this proposition is more vicious than the other one proposed by the gentleman from New York. I think it a greater wrong for the Government to suffer the paying out of the Indian trust funds without its supervision than it is to pay out its own money. Therefore I insist on the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. I simply wish to say that it is a very poor policy that will prevent these Indians from spending their own money for the benefit of their own children, in the way that everybody concedes is best for themselves and this country.

Mr. LITTLE. If these Indians were capable of self-government, the position of the gentleman would be correct. Otherwise it is not.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. My amendment leaves it to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

That all expenditure of money appropriated for school purposes in this act shall be at all times under the supervision and direction of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and in all respects in conformity with such conditions, rules, and regulations as to the conduct and methods of instruction and expenditure of money as may be from time to time prescribed by him, subject to the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That not more than $167 shall be expended for the annual support and education of any one pupil in any school herein specifically appropriated for, except when, by reason of epidemic, accident, or other similar cause, the attendance is so reduced that a larger expenditure is absolutely necessary for the efficient operation of the school affected, when the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, may allow a larger per capita expenditure, such expenditure to continue only so long as the said necessity therefor shall exist: Provided further, That the total amount appropriated for the support of such school shall not be exceeded: Provided further, That this provision shall apply to the fiscal years 1899 and 1900.

Mr. CANNON. I move to strike out the last word. I would be glad to have the attention of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS].

Some little while ago we passed the section touching appropriations for schools in the Indian Territory. In conversation with the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], I find that he has a statement of the trust funds and the income therefrom that will be devoted to education under the provision that has been adopted, and I should be glad to appeal to him, if it meets his approval, that he insert that information in the RECORD or state it so that it can go in the RECORD.

Mr. CURTIS. Under section 19 of the act of June 28, 1898, a change was made in the manner of paying out the funds of the various Indian tribes in the Indian Territory, providing that no payment of any moneys on any account whatever thereafter be made by the United States to any of the tribal governments or to any officer thereof for disbursement, and by the provisions of the treaty made with the Chickasaw and Choctaw nations it is provided that revenues from coal and asphalt lands, or so much thereof as shall be necessary, shall be used for the education of the children of Indian blood of the members of said tribes. This money is to be collected under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

In view of these regulations, the Secretary of the Interior appointed a superintendent of Indian schools for the Indian Territory, and he now has charge of the schools in the Chickasaw and Choctaw nations, but has not taken full control of the schools in the Creek and Cherokee nations. It will be found on investigation that there are 9 boarding schools and 65 day schools in the Creek Nation; 2 seminaries, 1 orphan asylum, 1 high school for the colored, and 124 day schools in the Cherokee Nation. There are 10 seminaries in the Chickasaw and Choctaw nations, 13 day schools in the Chickasaw Nation, and 100 day schools now in operation in the Choctaw Nation. There are in the Indian Territory about 20,000 Indian children of school age. This amendment is so drawn that the superintendent may take charge of all schools in the Indian Territory outside of the Seminole Nation.

There is no question about the tribes having sufficient funds to pay the expenses of conducting their schools. The Choctaws have a school fund of $49,000, the Cherokees have a school fund of $850,000, and the other tribes use a part of the interest they receive from their vast trust funds for school purposes. The four tribes covered by this amendment receive in annual interest about $400,000. The school buildings have already been erected except, perhaps, in the Chickasaw Nation, the western part of which has no school accommodations for the Indian children.

There are 50,000 white children of school age in the Indian Territory who are not accommodated, but I am advised that arrangements have been made for some of these children to be accommodated in the schools of the Chickasaw and Choctaw countries. No doubt the same arrangement could be made with the schools in the other nations if it were deemed best. In order that the committee may be advised as to the trust funds of the various nations in the Indian Territory it will be found that the Choctaws have over $975,000, the Creeks have over $2,000,000, the Chickasaws have over $1,000,000, and the Cherokees have over $700,000. I do not give the amount that the Seminoles have because they are not included in this amendment.

The superintendent of schools, who has charge of the schools in the Chickasaw and Choctaw nations, says that they have had no trouble on account of lack of funds. The proposed amendment will put the schools in the hands of the Government, so there will be a uniform system of education among the four tribes.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That no purchase of supplies for which appropriations are herein made, exceeding in the aggregate $500 in value at any one time, shall be made without first giving at least three weeks' public notice by advertisement, except in case of exigency, when, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, who shall make official record of the facts constituting the exigency, and shall report the same to Congress at its next session, he may direct that purchases may be made in open market in amount not exceeding $3,000 at any one purchase: Provided, That funds herein and heretofore appropriated for construction of artesian wells, ditches, and other works for irrigating may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, be expended in open market: Provided further, That purchase in open market shall, as far as practicable, be made from Indians, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior may, when practicable, arrange for the manufacture, by Indians upon the reservation, of shoes, clothing, leather, harness, and wagons, and such other articles as the Secretary of the Interior may deem advisable.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Insert after the word "advisable," in line 23:

"Provided further, That the Indians to whom lands have been allotted on the Yakima Reservation, in the State of Washington, shall be permitted to lease such allotted lands for any term not exceeding ten years, upon such terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior."

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Chairman, the reason I propose this amendment is because of the peculiar character of the lands on this reservation and the conditions there. Under the law at the present time these Indians are permitted to lease these lands for five years. This land is arid sagebrush land. A ditch was constructed several years ago under the control of the Government that is proposed to water and irrigate about 20,000 acres of land.

This land is very productive when irrigated; but the expense of putting these lands in cultivation or clearing it of sagebrush and of leveling and putting it in alfalfa, which is the most productive and profitable crop, costing not less than $10 or $15 an acre, is such that it is almost impossible to lease these lands for the period of five years. If this period were extended, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, so that he could make these leases for a longer period of time, he could impose such conditions that almost the entire amount of this land could be required to be in alfalfa at the termination of the lease; and if certain other improvements should be required in the way of fences, construction of buildings, and improvements, it would be of great benefit to these Indians to have this done, because if this property can be turned over to them, at the expiration of the term of the lease, productive in alfalfa, fenced, and improved to a great extent, it is certainly far better and would benefit them more than if they should receive a certain amount of money per annum.

Mr. LITTLE. I desire to ask the gentleman a question about the matter. I will state as a general proposition that I do not favor long leases in these matters, but I am not familiar with the situation of the reservation affected by the gentleman's amendment. I want to ask the gentleman if the matter has been submitted to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and if he has the views of the Indian Office on the subject?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have. I talked with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and he said that whatever we deemed advisable he would approve, because he knew the conditions there somewhat, and knew that we were familiar with the conditions there; and it is such that it would not permit us to get these lands leased for five years, on account of this peculiar condition.

Mr. LITTLE. Do I understand the gentleman to say that it is impracticable, if not impossible, to secure a five years' lease and open up and irrigate these lands?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is almost impossible to do that to any advantage.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read to the conclusion of section 6 of the bill.

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to save the time to be consumed in reading the seventh section by raising the point of order against the entire section from line 7, on page 59, to line 7 of page 70, inclusive. I believe it is conceded that it is open to the point of order of being new legislation. I make the point now, so as to save the time that would be consumed in reading the treaty.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is a treaty.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is a treaty, and I hope the gentleman will withdraw the point of order that he makes against it. If he understood the condition that exists in that country, I do not think he would insist on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas would not contend that the point of order is not well taken?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I understand that under Rule XXI it is new legislation.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I am quite in harmony with the gentleman's proposition, I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, of not having legislation upon these appropriation bills. It has come to my knowledge, however, or I think it has, if I am correctly informed, that the development of a part of Oklahoma and the welfare of all the Indians concerned, as well as the white people, would be benefited by the ratification of this treaty. I only want to make a suggestion to the gentleman, if I am correctly informed, and I think I am, that while it is in the teeth of the rules, I admit, but possibly and probably, such as is my information, that the necessity is so great that the gentleman from New York might well appeal for unanimous consent, and that would include the gentleman, of course, to let it go on.

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Chairman, I am advised that there are bills pending at this time in both Houses of Congress, separate bills, for the ratification of this treaty. There are some reasons why this ratification ought not to take place in this way. I do not care to go into them. I have a communication from the Secretary of the Interior and from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, but I do not care to raise any question. It is new legislation, and therefore obnoxious to the rule.

Mr. SHERMAN. The gentleman will not permit it to go by unanimous consent.

Mr. BROSIUS. I can not.

Mr. SHERMAN. We passed the bill last Congress as a separate measure, but the Senate would not pass it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. FLYNN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to refer to page 23 for an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to recur to page 23 of the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FLYNN. Mr. Chairman, I submit the following amendment.

Insert in line 16, page 23, after the word "dollars," the following:

"Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to said Sac and Fox Indians the sum of $50,000, to be immediately available, out of the amount of money now to the credit of said Indians in the United States Treasury.

Mr. FLYNN. Mr. Chairman, I merely desire to ask the consent of the House that I may make a statement with reference to the necessity for this amendment. These Indians have had the smallpox. The Secretary, the agent, and the Commissioner all recommend this relief at once. Their houses, their beds, and their clothing have all been burned up, and they are now living in tents, some of them three or four families in one tent.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I opposed an amendment of a like character yesterday, or the day before, offered by the gentleman from Oregon, because I am against the proposition at all times of taking from the Treasury funds of this trust, placed there for the benefit of the Indians. I have no doubt, from the statement of the gentleman from Oklahoma, that this is a case which presents a peculiar state of facts, and perhaps is unusually meritorious; and yet, notwithstanding that fact, Mr. Chairman, I can not refrain from opposing a proposition to permit any of these Indian tribes to withdraw from the Treasury of the United States any of their funds. If they are in a deplorable condition, let us give them whatever is absolutely necessary as a gratuity. If we do not do it now, we establish the precedent of withdrawing money from the Treasury, or permitting them to do it on their own application, and by and by the time may come when we shall be obliged to support them entirely. The same principle is involved in this amendment as in that presented by the gentleman from Oregon, which was successfully opposed the other day.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma about what is the amount of the fund belonging to these Indians?

Mr. FLYNN. When Congress treated for their land there was coming to them $485,000, which was tendered to the Indians, every dollar of it. The Indians said, "No; we do not need it all. Place $300,000 to our credit in the Treasury." For the first time in the history of that tribe all of the chiefs have united, notwithstanding they would not take the money when offered, and they say now, "We have lost our houses, our beds; we have lost our clothes, and five or six families are living in tents furnished by the Government." Now, something must be done for them. The Secretary recommends it, the Commissioner recommends it, and the agent recommends it. I will read the letters:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 2, 1900.

SIR: I have the honor to herewith transmit, for the information and action of your committee, a copy of a letter of even date from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and of a petition from the Sac and Fox of the Mississippi tribe of Indians, in Oklahoma, and of a letter from their agent, asking that an appropriation be made from their tribal fund of $300,000, now to their credit in the Treasury at 5 per cent interest, to relieve them from the great destitution caused by the epidemic of smallpox from which they suffered during the past year.

The Indians have asked that the sum of $100,000 be taken from the above-named fund and paid to them per capita, which meets the favor of their agent.

The Commissioner, however, is of the opinion that $50,000 will be sufficient for their immediate needs, and recommends the appropriation of that amount, in which I concur.

Very respectfully,
THOS. RYAN,
Acting Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS,
House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, February 2, 1900.

SIR: In view of the large amount of property necessarily destroyed in stamping out the epidemic of smallpox among the Sac and Fox of Mississippi Indians, in Oklahoma, during the last year, which left them, in consequence, in a destitute condition, they now petition that $100,000 of their fund of $300,000 now in the Treasury drawing interest at 5 per cent be paid them in cash.

In support of this request, I inclose copies of the petition from the chiefs and counsel of their tribe, and also a letter from the United States Indian agent, forwarding their petition, with his approval.

I respectfully recommend that $50,000 be paid them in lieu of their request for $100,000. This will give them about $90 apiece, which, in my opinion, is all that is necessary for their relief.

Respectfully,
W. A. JONES,
Commissioner.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

SAC AND FOX AGENCY, OKLA., January 15, 1900.

The within application is herewith forwarded with my approval.

During the smallpox epidemic last year we were compelled to burn all houses, stables, sheds, etc., in or near the infected district; also all of the clothing and household effects of the infected people. This action has left many of them without shelter, except tents that were furnished them at the time, their annuities not being sufficient to more than keep them in food. Many of this tribe are in a condition to improve their lands if they had the means. A payment to them of the amount requested will be a great assistance on this line.

I also believe that it will be good policy to pay this fund to them as soon as practical and reduce the amount of their annuities, and thus compel them to depend to some extent upon labor and not wholly upon their annuities for support, which in most cases is the rule.

Unless some action is taken on this line they will be incapacitated to care for themselves or their land at the end of the twenty-five-year trust period, of which eight years have now elapsed. While it is true that some of them will squander their share, the majority will make good use of it and are now much more capable of handling it than when they were paid the $185,000 eight years ago, and were offered the full amount of the $485,000. Hoping their request will meet with your approval, I am,

Very respectfully,
LEE PATRICK,
United States Indian Agent.

SAC AND FOX AGENCY, OKLA., January 10, 1900.

The COMMISSIONER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C.:

We, the chiefs and council of the Sac and Fox tribe of Indians in Oklahoma, this day in council assembled to discuss and consider the destitute condition of our people in consequence of that dread scourge, smallpox, which removed so many of our members the past year, and the necessity of the destruction of our property by fire to destroy the germs of the disease, including our houses, clothing, bedding, implements, harness, valuable trinkets, etc.; therefore, we have unanimously resolved to petition Congress to appropriate $100,000 of our money in the hands of the Government remaining of the treaty with the Cherokee Commission on June 12, 1890, to be disbursed per capita to the tribe.

For which we ever pray.

Witnesses to marks:
P. S. WHATLEY.
W. R. GULICK.

I certify on honor that the foregoing application was fully explained to and understood by the chiefs and council before they signed the same, and that it expresses the true and unanimous vote of the council.

WILLIAM HURR,
Interpreter and Secretary of Council.

SAC AND FOX AGENCY, OKLA.,
January 10, 1900.

Mr. LITTLE. Are the Indians on their allotment?

Mr. FLYNN. They are upon their allotment.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I differ with the chairman of the committee on the proposition that we ought never to invade this fund of the tribes. I believe that where there is a crying necessity, as in this case, based on the letter of the Secretary of the Interior, that it is wiser to make to them a small payment out of the fund. If, when their funds are gone, it becomes the duty of the Government to make an appropriation, we can attend to it at that time. From what I have learned in regard to this case, I think it is a case of absolute necessity for the Indians. They have their allotment, and from the statement of the Secretary of the Interior a great many of them are capable of a proper use of this money.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I do think that if any exception is made in this case it ought also to be made in the case presented by the gentleman from Oregon yesterday. If the committee is to permit the withdrawal in this case, we ought to permit them in both. I shall request the committee to do it in the case of the gentleman from Oregon if this amendment is adopted.

Mr. LITTLE. Does the gentleman from New York think the two cases stand on a parallel footing? Does he think the necessity as great in one case as in the other?

Mr. SHERMAN. The question of necessity? No.

Mr. LITTLE. That is the ground upon which I base my favor of this proposition.

Mr. SHERMAN. There are other reasons in the Oregon case which to my mind are stronger than those presented by the gentleman from Oklahoma. I think if the application is to be allowed in either case, it should be allowed in both. My individual judgment is against allowing it in either, but I do not ask anybody that is disinclined to do it to follow my individual judgment.

Mr. LITTLE. I am not prepared to pass judgment against the amendment of the gentleman from Oregon, but, as I view this case, I think it is meritorious, and if the Oregon case stands on equal merit when presented to the House, I shall not object.

Mr. SHERMAN. We will none of us disagree in reference to the necessity of giving some aid of some kind to these Indians.

Mr. FLYNN. This is simply a proposition that these Indians may be allowed to use their own money instead of the Government spending it for them.

Mr. CURTIS. The agent having indicated that this money would be used for the erection of houses to take the place of those which have been burned, I submit it would be well to allow the amendment to pass.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, Mr. Chairman, I seem to be alone on this question, so far as the committee is concerned; those of my colleagues who are present seem to take a different view from mine. They are doubtless wiser than I am in many ways—perhaps in everything; and I am inclined to yield to their judgment. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I believe the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] is correct as to the general principle; but in view of this present emergency I think the amendment should be adopted.

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. FLYNN was agreed to.

Mr. TONGUE. Mr. Chairman, I now desire to offer the amendment which I explained to the House the other day——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the amendment would not be in order to this part of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask unanimous consent that we return to the portion of the bill to which the amendment would properly apply.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole return to page 31 of the bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The amendment of the gentleman from Oregon will be read.

Insert, at the end of line 24, page 31, after the word "cents," the following:

"ALSEA AND SILETZ INDIANS.

"The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed, on the passage of this act, to pay to such Alsea and other Indians on the Siletz Reservation, in Oregon, parties to an agreement made October 31, 1892, ratified by the act of Congress approved August 15, 1894 (28 Statutes, page 323), as shall be found to be competent and capable of managing and taking care of their own affairs their pro rata shares of the permanent fund of $100,000 appropriated by the said act of August 15, 1894, and now to their credit in the Treasury of the United States."

Mr. RIDGELY. I have no wish to detain the Committee of the Whole, nor have I sought to avail myself of an opportunity to cut out this amendment by my individual objection. But I again appeal to the committee to reject the amendment. The case is a very different one from that of the amendment which we have just permitted to go through. I think we ought not to begin to disburse these trust funds simply because in a business way some members of the tribe may desire the money.

Mr. TONGUE. I think if the gentleman will allow me to state my amendment he will not make any objection.

Mr. RIDGELY. The gentleman made his explanation the other day.

Mr. TONGUE. At the time I made that explanation the other day one very material fact had escaped me, as it had escaped the committee. My proposition was made then in pursuance of a recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior, following a statutory enactment of the United States. I did not then know, as I do now, that the request of the Secretary of the Interior is in pursuance of a treaty and is simply for the purpose of carrying out a treaty stipulation between the United States and the Alsea and Siletz Indians. In a treaty executed in 1894, which members will find on page 325, volume 28 of the Statutes at Large, I find in Article III this provision:

That in case the Secretary of the Interior may at any time be satisfied that any of said Indians are fully competent and capable of managing and taking care of their full pro rata of said purchase money, and that it will be to their interest to receive the same, and that other portions of said Indians are not so capable and competent, then he shall recommend to Congress that sufficient amount of such principal sum so held in trust as provided in section 2 of this agreement shall be appropriated to pay the full pro rata of such competent and capable Indians of such principal fund, and when the same shall be paid and receipted for personally by each Indian so paid, then such Indians shall have no further interests in said trust fund.

That is the provision of the treaty stipulation between the United States and these Indians. It provides the manner in which the Government is to pay the purchase money to the Indians for this land which they sold to the Government. Now, the Secretary of the Interior, pursuant to that treaty provision, has stated that 306 of those Indians are capable of taking care of themselves, and he asks Congress to pay this money according to the contract which we made with them. This is not a question for our discretion; it is not a question of what we may think best; it is simply a question whether we will carry out an absolute treaty stipulation and pay the money to these Indians according to the terms agreed upon between them and the United States.

Mr. COWHERD. When was this recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior made?

A MEMBER. About a year ago.

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. TONGUE was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the committee rise and report the bill as amended to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. LITTLE. If the gentleman will withhold that motion for a moment, I desire to ask a question in regard to a provision in lines 23 and 24 of page 4 of the bill. There is there an appropriation of $1,400 for the Quapaw Agency, in the Indian Territory. I had understood that that agency had been abolished.

Mr. CURTIS. I suggest to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE] that we allow this matter to pass; and if it be the desire of the Commissioner that this agency be abolished, a provision to that effect can be inserted in the Senate.

Mr. LITTLE. My recollection is that the Commissioner said that the agency was not needed and that it would be abolished, and I thought the committee had taken such action.

Mr. SHERMAN. When the subcommittee was at the Indian Office discussing these various agencies, this agency was among those which the Commissioner said might be done away with. The gentleman will recollect the Commissioner said he would examine specifically into the facts in regard to four or five agencies which were under discussion, and would report later whether it would be feasible to do away with them at this time. The Commissioner did not report in favor of dispensing with the Quapaw Agency, and therefore the provision has remained in the bill.

Mr. LITTLE. I will not press the matter further.

The motion of Mr. SHERMAN was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7433) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, and with the recommendation that as amended the bill do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded upon any of the amendments? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments recommended by the Committee of the Whole were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS TWELVE-MILE BAYOU, LOUISIANA.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5487) authorizing the construction by the Texarkana, Shreveport and Natchez Railway Company of a bridge across Twelve-mile Bayou, near Shreveport, La.

The bill was read. It provides that the Texarkana, Shreveport and Natchez Railway Company, a railroad corporation duly incorporated under the laws of the State of Louisiana, its successors or assigns, be, and it is hereby, authorized to construct and maintain a railway bridge and approaches thereto over and across Twelve-mile Bayou, in Caddo Parish, La., at or about 8 miles above the point where said bayou empties into Red River.

Mr. TERRY. This bill is unanimously reported by the committee and indorsed by the Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TERRY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE ERMENTROUT.

The SPEAKER. The hour for the special order having arrived, it will be taken up. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GREEN] is recognized.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that some of the members of this House who desire to deliver eulogies to-day are unavoidably absent, I ask unanimous consent that such of the members as may so desire be permitted to print their remarks on this occasion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that members who desire to do so may print remarks upon the life and character of Mr. ERMENTROUT. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I present the following resolutions, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. DANIEL ERMENTROUT, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended, that opportunity may be given for fitting tribute to his memory.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy of the same to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That, as an additional mark of respect, the House, at the conclusion of these memorial proceedings, do adjourn.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, since the commencement of this term of Congress the Hon. DANIEL ERMENTROUT, Congressman-elect from the Ninth district of Pennsylvania, comprising the counties of Berks and Lehigh, passed over to that "suburb of the life elysian, whose portal we call death."

In his beautiful mansion of "Graüstein," surrounded by his wife, daughter, and loving friends, at the dawn of a beautiful autumn Sabbath morning—the 18th of September—he passed away peacefully.

His death was sudden, entirely unexpected, and the news came as a shock to the community in which he lived. He died universally lamented by the constituency he had served faithfully for many years.

He left to survive him a widow, Adelaide Louise, née Metzger, one son, Fitz Daniel, an attorney of the Berks County bar, and a daughter, Adelaide Louise.

His remains were interred at the Charles Evans Cemetery, in Reading, on September 21, 1899, and were buried with Congressional honors.

DANIEL ERMENTROUT was a Pennsylvanian to the manor born. His birthplace was the city of Reading, in the county of Berks, January 24, 1837. He descended from a long line of sturdy, industrious, and substantial Pennsylvania German ancestors. They may be said to have been indigenous to the soil of Berks, for his great-great-grandfather, John Ermentrout, in 1739 came from the Palatinate and settled there, and his great-grandfather, Christopher; his grandfather, John E., and his father, William E., were all natives and lifelong residents, as was the deceased. True to the faith of his fathers and the traditions of "Old Berks," the Gibraltar of Democracy, he was a Democrat of Democrats.

No man there ever enjoyed for so long a time the confidence and favor of the people, especially those affiliated with the Democratic party.

From his early manhood until his death, with but a few short intermissions, he represented them in some public capacity.

Admitted to the bar August 3, 1859, he was elected district attorney in 1862. From 1867 to 1870 he was thrice elected city solicitor. In 1873 he was elected to represent Berks County in the senate of Pennsylvania, and reelected in 1876 to serve until 1880. In that year he was elected to the Forty-seventh Congress, and subsequently reelected to the Forty-eighth, Forty-ninth, and Fiftieth. In 1896 he was again elected to the Fifty-fifth Congress, and reelected to the Fifty-sixth.

Such, in brief, is the record of his public career, and its long period sufficiently attests the high esteem in which he was held by his constituents, as well as their opinion of the fidelity and usefulness of his service.

In his latter days, among his people and his many friends at the national capital and throughout the neighboring States—for he had a wide acquaintanceship—he was familiarly known as "Uncle Dan," a title not given him on account of great age, for at the time of his death he had not yet reached the sixty-third milestone, but because he was affable and easily approached, without affectation, ostentation, or vanity. This easy and familiar manner marked his intercourse with everyone, and made him many warm friends everywhere.

As his successor in this body I could not fail to be impressed with his great popularity here, not only among those who had served with him, but among the whole line of employees, from the highest official to the humblest. And many a courtesy and kind favor has been cheerfully shown me here because of the love and friendship they bore him.

Men at this Capitol seem to have loved him even for his very failings.

What greater testimonial could one have of possessing a kind heart than that of shedding rays of sunshine over his pathway and leaving the world happier for his having lived there?

What greater encomium of praise than the fact that by his words of approval and encouragement he made the burden of his fellow-man lighter and easier to be borne?

No one more dearly loved his home, the city of Reading, its beautiful location and surroundings. He often referred to it as a paradise on earth. Nothing gave him more pleasure than a ramble through the nooks and dells, over the craggy heights, and in the solemn woods of Mounts Penn and Neversink, twin promontories which guard the city "on the east and the rising sun."

Looking from their heights toward the setting sun, he saw the bright silver band of the beautiful Schuylkill, which forms that city's western boundary, and stretching beyond for miles, until obscured by the mountains on the horizon, lay the broad, fertile acres of Berks, in the Lebanon Valley. Turning to the east, he saw another enchanting and, if possible, a more picturesque landscape, the early home of the French Huguenots and those who fled Europe to escape oppression and settled in the deep, rich lands of the "Oley Valley."

In the north loom up the mountains at the head waters of the Schuylkill River, in whose bowels are the mines which produce hundreds of millions of tons of the far-famed anthracite coal. To the south, here and there along the river's banks, are scattered furnaces, mills, and manufactories, converting the ore into iron and its many products. On every side as far as the eye can see are scattered the towns, villages, and hamlets of the sturdy and industrious yeomen of Berks, among whom he counted a multitude of friends.

Lines of steel rails are seen approaching the city at his feet from every direction. Long trains of cars at all times are in sight, bearing their freight of grain, coal, iron, and merchandise to it and through it to tide water, to be ere long distributed over the civilized world. He has grown up with this city nestling below him. From an humble village of a few thousands it has grown from his boyhood days to be a great manufacturing metropolis, counting nearly a hundred thousand souls within its confines. The smoke of its many industries rises from innumerable stacks and hovers like a great, dark cloud over it. Every article of commerce is produced there, from a paper bag to the huge ice plants and cotton and sugar presses scattered everywhere through the sunny South and the green isles of the Gulf. There are made the huge cannon and the steel shells which made our Navy the pride of this nation and the terror of our foes. The city's growth has been as steady as are her people, and year by year has added to its wealth and commerce and to the happiness and comfort of her busy, bustling population.

DANIEL ERMENTROUT will always be remembered as one of the men who have largely contributed to its great growth and prosperity.

What wonder is it that through all his life he so greatly loved and was so justly proud of his birthplace and of the people who made it their home?

Believing as he did, that the progress and happiness of the American people and their future safety and success were dependent largely upon the education of the masses through the growth and expansion of the common-school system, he was a devoted friend of that institution. His people were among the pioneers in its establishment and earnest workers for its success. He taught a number of terms in these public schools, and for years was a school controller of Reading. His father for many years was also a school controller and at one time served as treasurer of the board. His brother, John S., was superintendent of the public schools of the county and founded the Keystone State Normal School, serving in it as principal and professor. James N. Ermentrout, now president judge of the county courts, not only taught school, but served as assistant county superintendent. Such is his record and the record of the members of his immediate family in the great cause of public education, which has so radically changed the character of the people of eastern Pennsylvania in the last two decades.

Mr. ERMENTROUT not only received in his youth a good education, having attended Elmwood Institute at Norristown, Pa., and Franklin and Marshall College at Lancaster, Pa., but during his life was a constant reader of the works of the best authors. He had an intimate knowledge of English, German, French, and Latin and spoke the Pennsylvania German dialect with the best. He claimed that it was often stronger and more expressive than the English. I know he was familiar with many of the gems of both English poetry and prose and delighted to quote celebrated passages.

When Congressman ERMENTROUT came to the bar he gave great promise of being a strong and successful advocate, and it was not long before his legal talents were recognized by his being chosen district attorney, the representative of the commonwealth in all criminal actions. As he pressed farther into the realm of politics he soon found that "the law was a jealous mistress," and gradually drifted farther away from the work of his chosen profession and became deeper immersed in politics and public affairs.

In his case it may truly be said that a first-rate lawyer was sacrificed to make a useful public official. He never entirely gave up the practice of the law, but during his whole life divided his attention between legal business and public work and political organization and management—giving to the latter the larger portion of his time and energy.

Fortune blessed him by giving him a younger brother, who was a student, a man of remarkable address and acumen, who possessed not only a judicial mind and bearing, but had rare good sense and judgment coupled with great industry. The large practice he had gathered from his many friends and acquaintances he placed in his hands and it throve apace, and his brother was finally called to fill a seat on the common-pleas bench.

It is a fact without precedent in that section of the State that at the same time and for some years brothers held the two highest positions within the gift of the people. And in all fairness it must be said of both that they held these places with credit and honor.

To his colleagues in this body who served with him in the halls of Congress I leave that part of his life and career. I am not personally acquainted with it, and they have promised to cover this period in their remarks following mine.

I will speak of the man only as I knew him from his manhood's prime to the time of his death.

The picture that presents itself is that of a young man of robust physique, a strong face, rather careless carriage, with a strong, self-reliant air, dressed neatly but plainly, aggressive and forceful in manner; in neither dress nor manner nor look did he show a single effeminate sign.

He talked loud and volubly, and had always plenty of physical strength and force back of him. He was a vigorous man, and you soon learned that by his hearty hand shake and often by the heartier pat he gave you on the back. He had equally strong feelings and convictions, and he was ingenuous rather than ingenious. Sometimes he tried to practice the Machiavelian arts and the style of a diplomat, but he signally failed in such attempts. By nature he was frank and brusque and he never would have succeeded as an actor. When he was about, one always felt the suspicion of a stiff breeze blowing not very far off, and when he became excited it was very near.

He never did anything quietly and easily, but energetically and vigorously. This was so in his work and in his diversions. There was no halfway about him. It was, "Forward, right and left, through."

At the bar and in the political arena these qualities made him a warrior, and he never suffered a defeat or experienced a failure from lack of force, effort, or energy. While his opponents and competitors slept he worked, and the man he crossed swords with found him a foeman worthy of his steel, and so he fought until the end. In a political campaign he never rested until the primaries were closed and the result known, and not then if the verdict left anything in doubt.

He was often charged with fighting hardest for himself, which was natural, and not fighting sufficiently hard for his friends, which, of course, was a matter of opinion. Yet no one had more loyal friends and followers, nor did anyone hold them so long. More than that, he had a faculty of making up with opponents and placating his enemies. After the fiercest contest he was always the first to offer to shake hands and make up, urge that bygones should be bygones, and apologize for sharp personalities that might have been indulged in in the heat of the contest. In this way he won over many opponents, and held as friends those who had bitterly opposed him and his ambitions.

As he grew older I can not say that this strong aggressive spirit was perceptibly tamed; and if so, only when the ravages of disease had marked him as their victim. He still retained his splendid fighting qualities, and when he died may truly be said to have died with his armor on.

As his life was not like the deep, quiet, and sluggish waters, but like the active, splashing, rushing mountain torrent, his political and business career was not a pathway strewn with roses. In business, as he expressed it, he looked after "number one," and hence aroused many jealousies among his fellow-practitioners; his bluff qualities and often dictatorial manner made him enemies and his soaring ambition raised many competitors. Inside and outside his party he was forced into many a joust, but only on one occasion can I remember him to have been unhorsed.

I have fought with him and against him, have won and lost with him and against him, and feel qualified to speak by the book, for I have felt the weight of his sword. In his heart he loved a hard fight and admired and respected a sturdy opponent. Such was his nature.

He was the only man in all that county that ever survived a defeat and again by native force forged to the front and gained a personal victory.

He was a keen observer of people, an accurate reader of human nature. He had a fine memory for faces and names, and among the more stable rural population knew almost every voter, and often their wives. He knew their history and traditions, their language, and their friendship, and often was able to tell a youngster more of his father and grandfather than he had ever known. This, with his free and easy manner and plain, frank bearing, was one of his great secrets of success, if secret it was. Besides this, he not only respected the opinions of his people, but their very prejudices.

Like other men of his positive stamp, he never pleased everyone. He was often blamed for having too strong opinions, at other times charged with having none. He certainly did try to follow the ideas of the people he represented, yet it can not justly be charged that he trimmed his sail for every passing wind.

He never was a hypocrite and never tried by long face and sanctimonious pretenses to gain preference or power. Yet I know he worshiped nature and revered nature's God, and in his heart of hearts loved the handiwork of the great Creator. This made him a kind and indulgent husband and father and a warm friend. A very intimate and sympathetic friend said of him, "He could picture in words of eloquence the matchless beauties of our landscapes and tell the silent story of stream and tree and wood—how the shifting scenery of nature reveals the handiwork of the Author of all beauty."

Mr. ERMENTROUT may not have been an orator, although at times in his speeches he reached the point of true oratory. He always made a vigorous speech, and, when well prepared, a speech which both by his manner of delivery and the matter it contained challenged attention and was a clear, logical, and forceful presentation of his views. I do not think it can be contended that he was a great statesman, but he was generally acknowledged to be a useful public servant.

Uncle Dan loved a melodious song and a good story, and was ever fond of good cheer. He never was brighter and happier than around a festive board thronged with merry companions. There he was at his best, and there you saw his sunniest smile and heard his heartiest laugh; there he unloaded his store of sparkling wit and the choicest tales gathered from his long acquaintanceship with the brightest men of this land.

When every other trait is forgotten, his bosom friends will call to mind the pleasant times and happy hours they spent in his company. He had faults, but they, too, were convivial and injured none more than himself. Whatever may be said of him, he was a useful citizen, an incorruptible public servant, whose long career was never assailed with even the suspicion of personal dishonor.

To a man of his vigorous constitution fourscore years should have been his allotted time; but his intense nervous energy burned the candle of life at both ends.

He fought a good fight. He has run his course;
He tasted of life's bitter and its sweet;
He was loved, respected, and honored;
He was hated, reviled, and condemned;
His virtues many times outweighed his vices.

And when we measure him by the Golden Rule it will be found that he did the work his hands found to do faithfully and well and that his useful life was a blessing to his fellow-man. He has crossed the dark river. His life's service has paid the obolus to old Charon, the ferryman of the Styx. He has entered the land of the hereafter, in that other life of growth and progress to take up again the burden laid down in this and to struggle ever onward and upward in the realm of life eternal.

[Mr. GAINES addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Speaker, when Leonardo da Vinci was painting his famous fresco, "The Last Supper," on the wall of a Dominican convent the friar became impatient at the tardiness of the work and reproached the painter, who, answering, said: "I still lack two faces, one of which, the Saviour, I can not hope to find on earth, and I have not attained the power of presenting it to myself in imagination, with all the perfection of beauty and spiritual grace demanded in a representation of the divine incarnation: the other is that of Judas, and I hardly think it possible to render graphically the features of a man who, after receiving so many benefits from Him, deliberately betrayed his Lord and Master." Similarly, he who undertakes to depict in words the extremes of goodness and badness in human character, like Leonardo, will be unable to complete his picture, for no mastery of the art of characterization will enable him adequately to portray the radiant image of the divine in man at his best, or to graphically render the dark incarnation of evil in him at his worst.

The history of man has revealed him as a being compounded of diverse elements, including much that is common to other animals; indeed, it seems scientific to hold with recent thinkers that every animal of forest, field, and flood has maintained a foothold in man and left the print of one or another of its features in every upright, heaven-facing creature. From this point of view he is a most inharmonious being. "Compound of beast and angel, devil and deity," said Coleridge. "The glory and scorn of the universe," said Pascal. "A jewel of God," said Parker. "A rapacious vulture," said Cowley. "Half dust and half deity, alike unfit to sink or soar," said Byron. How noble in reason, yet how prone to error; how infinite in faculty, yet how low in desire; in form and moving how express and admirable, yet how low he bends to vice and folly; in action how like an angel, in acts how like a devil; in apprehension how like a god, yet in appetite how like a brute. This is man in his totality; but, as Emerson suggests, "Man has been differentiated into men, good men, middling men, and bad men." So we can conceive them in their several characters and distinguish one from the other.

The point of these reflections, obviously enough, is that man in his ascent outgrows the tiger, the bear, the serpent, the wolf, or whatever remnant of the animal that may have survived in him. He sloughs off the lower and baser and climbs to the higher and nobler, and develops by slow stages the highest manhood. A perfect being does not exist. In every character there is the serpent's hiss and the bird's song. It has been said that God could not make a perfect being in a day if he tried. Perfection is an evolution, and can only be reached by struggle and growth. What he does depends on what he is. He gives out what is in him. He is like the coal in the grate, of which science declares that in decomposing it gives out the same amount of light and heat as was borrowed from the sun by the antediluvian trees which entered into its composition. So the human creature gives out as much of one and another quality as he derives by heredity, as much of goodness and gracious sunshine as he has drawn from the infinite fountain of light and love.

A man of spirit, purpose, ambition, and aspiration; struggling with difficulties, infirmities, adverse fortune; stumbling, falling, rising; renewing the struggle, falling again, and again rising; climbing with beak and claw, daring every fate and triumphing over all, is the grandest and most impressive object ever presented for our contemplation. He is a royal man, a nobleman of nature's own brand, who exemplifies the attribute which led the Greeks to call man "anthropos," the upward looker.

Mr. ERMENTROUT in his interesting career presents the figure of a struggling, striving, strenuous man, battling with the enemies of his high purpose and his ardent hopes, and whatever reverses overtook him served only as incentives to renewed exertion, for his purpose never wavered and his hope sprang eternal. In the words of Campbell, "She could smile at the ruins of creation and light her torch at nature's funeral pile."

My acquaintance with Mr. ERMENTROUT covered a long period of years. His origin was neither obscure nor distinguished. He suffered the disadvantage of neither rank nor fortune. He came from that common level of worldly conditions and that high level of honor and respectability, that clean and wholesome atmosphere of piety and morals, which in all American history have constituted the rich garden soil from which have sprung intellectual vigor and moral excellence. He was educated at Franklin and Marshall College, located in the district I have the honor to represent. A beautiful and accomplished girl of my own city became his wife, and their home up to the time of his death was in a neighboring city, in the district which he represented on this floor for several terms. He was a man of light and leading in his community. He was a diligent student; his reading took a wide range; he gleaned from every field of knowledge and possessed an amplitude of intelligence which made him a valuable acquisition to any social or professional circle. For nearly forty years his time was divided between the legal profession and public life. He was a success in both. He was a masterful politician. His ability, industry, tact, and the high esteem in which he was held gave him a preeminence enjoyed by no other man in the politics of his district.

His devotion to his constituents was a conspicuous feature of his public life. He knew most of them personally. He took them into his confidence, watched their interests, guarded their rights, anticipated their wants, and served them in all needful ways with a fidelity as beautiful as his industry was tireless. He believed, what the career of every successful public man teaches, that the only way for a public servant to securely hold the confidence and affection of his constituents is in the demonstration of his worthiness by integrity, fidelity, industry, and efficiency in their service.

Our friend was the architect of his own career. The spurs he wore in the tournament of life were fashioned by his own effort and buckled to his heels with his own hands. He early learned that the genius of success is the genius of toil. The only Aladdin's lamp he ever knew was a heroic soul that no difficulty could daunt. His courage never sank before an adverse cast of fortune. When inspired by conviction and commanded by duty he turned neither to the right nor left. He was a hard fighter. The man who broke a lance with him when at his best was sure—

> To know the joy that warriors feel
> In foemen worthy of their steel.

But our friend has gone to his rest, leaving behind him for our instruction such lessons as his life teaches. To contemplate them and profit by them is the suggestion of wisdom.

"As the shadows steal at evening over the earth, softly closing the flowers and touching them to sleep silently and lovingly in the promise of a bright waking," so he fell asleep. Nature, with no rudeness in her touch, but softly and gently, disengaged the vital cord, and he passed serenely into rest on the other shore of that mysterious sea "that never yet has borne on any wave the image of a homeward sail."

Death had no terror for him. He besought those nearest to him not to mourn but to rejoice when he was called home, for to him his demise was only a transit to a higher state of being where life is in its completeness. For him death had no sting, the grave no victory. He passed into the unseen, I can easily believe, with the exultant words of Whitman's death song upon his lips:

> Joy, shipmates, joy;
> Our life is closed, our life begins;
> The long, long anchorage we leave.
> The ship is clear at last; she leaps,
> She quickly courses from the shore;
> Joy, shipmates, joy.

Now, as we leave the contemplation of our departed friend, those who loved him best can carry with them the consolatory reflection "that, while green grass will cover his grave, blue skies bend over it, sweet birds sing near it, and the place will be hallowed ground, yet greener than the grass, fairer than the skies, sweeter than the birds, more hallowed than the grave itself will be his fragrant memory enshrined with supreme sacredness in their heart of hearts."

Mr. ZIEGLER. Mr. Speaker, it is my sad privilege to join with other members of the House in paying brief tribute to the memory of DANIEL ERMENTROUT.

I am led to speak from the natural and instinctive prompting of a heart that bore a sincere friendship and regard for the deceased. It is an occasion when human passions are hushed; when political differences are laid aside, and when, in the midst of the solemnity that pervades the scene, we give expression to serious and solemn thought. It may truthfully be said that no one finds the least degree of pleasure in standing by the open grave and witnessing the funeral ceremony. All such occasions are characterized by a display of sorrow and grief. However sad the occasion, however intense the sorrow and grief, it is the duty of the living to bury the dead.

I was present at the funeral services of our deceased friend, DANIEL ERMENTROUT. I heard the learned minister standing beside the cold form eloquently extol his home, social, political, business, and religious life. The good and kind words spoken by him, as well as by those in the funeral cortege and by many who crowded the public streets of the city as he was carried to the grave, were as bright, cheerful, and comforting as the rays of the sun that dispelled the rainfall and clouds that overcast the morning of the day of his burial and flooded the open grave and charming scenery surrounding the place of his burial with its brightness and glory.

No human life is entirely exempt from sorrow, grief, trouble, anxiety, fault, or error, and let me express the hope that whatever sorrow or grief may at any time have crossed the pathway of our friend's life, whatever trouble or anxiety may have been his portion, whatever fault or error, all have been effectually blotted out in the sunlight of God's presence.

Mr. Speaker, we have with great propriety paused for a brief period from the discharge of our legislative duties to deliver becoming and commemorative remarks concerning our deceased friend, DANIEL ERMENTROUT. The discharge of this duty is not only customary but appropriate, and at the same time extremely mournful. Eloquent have been all the eulogistic tributes which the members of this House have placed upon our friend's grave. In the midst of our sorrow it is comforting to have heard him so well spoken of. After the splendid addresses of those who have preceded me, touching upon the life, character, and public services of DANIEL ERMENTROUT, it will be for me a difficult if not an impossible task to express new thought or gather flowers as bright as those already gathered and, weaving them into suitable and thoughtful design, place them upon his grave as a tribute to his memory. However, I would emphasize, if I may or can, several traits of character which stood out prominently in his life. Kindness and goodness of heart, twin virtues, were his in a marked degree.

A few days after my election as a member of this House I received a letter from him of whom I speak. This letter is an index of the man's character. It breathed words of congratulation. He felicitated himself upon the fact that he would have more company from his own State in the Fifty-sixth Congress than he had in the Fifty-fifth Congress, referring to the election of more members of his political faith from Pennsylvania. Alas! how vain and fleeting ofttimes are our hopes and expectations. He will not meet with us, as he fondly expected, in this assemblage. Death claimed him with startling suddenness, and he has passed over into "that mysterious realm where each shall take his chamber in the silent halls of death."

All sorrow at his demise, and yet I find constrained pleasure in bearing brief witness to his kindness and goodness of heart, not only as displayed to me personally, but as shown in speaking of his friends in Congress and of the officers of this House.

I knew the deceased during many years. I met him in the beautiful city where he lived. I frequently saw his commanding and influential presence in State conventions, and while our relations were not very intimate, still I must say that the kindness of the man's heart and his disposition to be of aid and assistance constantly manifested itself.

The letter to which I a moment ago referred spoke of his experience as a member of this House, and how from that experience he could be of assistance to newly elected members of this body, and then followed information and suggestions that proved very valuable to me.

He expressed the pleasure it would be to him to serve me in any way in his power, and hoped that our intercourse would be pleasant and agreeable. He spoke in the highest terms of his associates, regardless of political creed, and I remember that he referred in the kindliest terms to the Clerk of this House and his willingness to grant any assistance in obtaining useful information on the routine business of this House and the various Departments of the Government. In this way, therefore, were reflected the kindness and goodness of the deceased, and I may say these traits of character have been characteristic of the man during his entire professional, political, and public life.

Again, he was noted for his great personal devotion in the performance of duty. He was singularly sincere and conscientious in all his undertakings, and whatever his hands found to do he did with all his might. He was never faithless in any cause.

Whether at the bar in the trial of a case or in the struggle for the attainment of his political ambition; whether in the State senate or as a servant of the people in this House, it can truthfully be said of him that every energy of his tireless nature was thrown into a desire to creditably perform every duty. He was a good citizen, an assiduous lawyer, a faithful State senator and Congressman. His private and public record have been honorable. I have never heard anything to detract from his reputation as an experienced and faithful public servant. This reputation was richly earned, but only through ceaseless energy and conscientious performance of duty. He has gone from us forever. He lies buried beneath the soil of his native State, in a beautiful location in the cemetery where he expressed a desire to be buried and rest from his labors.

We do well to cherish the legacy of the kind and generous heart he has left us, and the fame of an honest and faithful public servant, gained by his earnest personal consecration to duty.

What lesson is there in this sad death and in this solemn occasion for us who survive? It seems to me the lesson may be appropriately learned by heeding the injunction:

So live, that when thy summons comes to join
The innumerable caravan which moves
To that mysterious realm where each shall take
His chamber in the silent halls of death,
Thou go not, like the quarry slave at night,
Scourged to his dungeon, but sustained and soothed
By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave
Like one that wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.

Mr. RYAN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I can not permit this opportunity to pass without paying my tribute of respect to the memory of my neighbor, the late Hon. DANIEL E. ERMENTROUT, of Reading, Pa.

When my colleague, Hon. HENRY D. GREEN, announced to this House the death of his distinguished predecessor, Mr. ERMENTROUT, a tomblike silence spread over this Chamber, and expressions of sorrow and regret fell from the lips of all who knew him.

His unblemished character and high standing as a citizen, a lawyer, and a statesman was well and favorably known throughout his native State, and as their Representative in the Congress of the United States he discharged his duties faithfully and conscientiously. So marked was his attention to the interest of his district and the country he loved that his colleagues, members of the Congress of the United States, upon hearing of his demise, through respect to his memory adjourned the House of Representatives, and later set apart this day that suitable tribute might be paid to the memory of the honored gentleman, late a member of this House.

Mr. Speaker, what greater tribute can be paid to the memory of the deceased than that bestowed upon him by the people of the Ninth Congressional district of Pennsylvania?

There on his native heath he was best known, and his life work so commendable that he was intrusted with the cares of State and nation; and in all his official career never violated a trust, and quick to respond to the needs of his district.

Well may it be said of him, he was kind, generous, and charitable, aggressive and sincere in his convictions, and to serve his constituents a labor of love.

His honesty of purpose, Mr. Speaker, impressed all who knew him, and recalls the admonition—

To thine own self be true;
And it will follow, as the night the day,
Thou canst not then be false to any man.

Nothing that I now say will add to the good name and fame of the deceased, so well and richly earned by him through life.

He erected for himself a monument that time can alone destroy, and as I listen to the many eloquent and touching tributes of respect paid to the deceased my heart is filled with gratitude toward mankind. Again may I ask, what greater monument to perpetuate the memory of DANIEL E. ERMENTROUT could be erected than that raised by the records of the Congress of the United States, presenting to the present and awaiting the perusal of future generations resolutions and memorials bearing upon the illustrious character and life work of the deceased? I knew him for many years; respected, honored, and admired, he passed from life to death.

Mr. ERMENTROUT had many qualities which endeared him to all who had the pleasure of his acquaintance. A gentleman of amiable disposition, who met his friends with a frank and cordial greeting; generous almost to a fault, ready to assist and remove the obstacles and burdens from others. Such a man, Mr. Speaker, could not live in a community without its being improved and bettered by his life. His sunny disposition and kindly nature attracted me to him, and in a short time our acquaintance ripened into friendship.

Shortly after my election to the Fifty-sixth Congress I received from him a message of congratulation, and later a personal call, at which time he spoke of the business to be transacted at this Congress.

Then, Mr. Speaker, he was in the very vigor of manhood, his powers fully developed, ripened by study, observation, and experience. At that time he presented to me his views on several questions since acted upon by this Congress; and I know how pleased he would have been to take an active part in debate on these questions. He was a partisan, a Democrat who never faltered, ready to go forth and spread the principles of Democracy. It has been said of him on the floor of this House that he never feared an opponent and admired a man who gave him vigorous battle.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, that was characteristic of Mr. ERMENTROUT, for I now recall that in conversation with him a short time before his demise he said, "Jim, some boys in my district are looking about for opposition to me. They want fight. Just wait till you see what old Uncle Dan will do:" and he said it in such a way as to leave no doubt about his ability to take care of himself. His firm will, courage of conviction, and generous nature brought to his support a host of friends who respected, honored, and admired him, and general were the regrets among the people of his Congressional district when they heard of his demise. Faults he may have had, for none are perfect, yet his virtues were many.

But, Mr. Speaker, Mr. ERMENTROUT did not gain all his laurels in public life. At home with his family, his neighbors, and his people he was an inspirer of happiness, ever ready to extend friendship and assist his fellow-man. Long will the people of his district fondly cherish his memory. There and here his genial company will be missed for all time, and while the country he loved mourns his loss, we must not forget that his loving wife and children have sustained an irreparable one; and while we deeply sympathize with them in this, their hour of bereavement, we pray that "He who doeth all things for the best" will strengthen and support them in a full resignation to the will of the Creator, for—

God moves in a mysterious way
His wonders to perform.

[Mr. DALY of New Jersey addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. MULLER. Mr. Speaker, my personal acquaintance with our honored colleague, whose sudden and untimely death about six months ago startled and shocked his friends and whose virtues we to-day commemorate, commenced in the Forty-eighth Congress. I had served in prior Congresses—the Forty-fifth and Forty-sixth—and so was considered a veteran, and we naturally became friends at once. Mr. ERMENTROUT came into the Forty-seventh Congress—of which I was not a member—as the successor of Hiester Clymer, a notable man, who achieved prominence and distinction in the House during his eight years' service, as he had previously attained high personal and political distinction and position in the party councils of the Democratic party of Pennsylvania and the nation. Mr. Clymer's predecessor, Hon. J. Lawrence Getz, was also a man of prominence and influence in his State, having, in addition to a high standing at the bar of Pennsylvania, been editor of the Reading Gazette and Democrat for over a quarter of a century, and prior to his election to Congress having served with credit in the legislature of Pennsylvania, being in 1857 the speaker of its lower house.

So it will be seen, Mr. Speaker, that "the old Berks district"—as it was familiarly called—has a reputation of sending strong men to the House of Representatives of the National Congress. DANIEL ERMENTROUT proved no exception to the rule which prevailed in "the old Berks district." Mr. ERMENTROUT was born at Reading on January 24, 1837, and his death occurred there on September 17, 1899. Mr. ERMENTROUT was a strong, brave, and earnest man. He had as positive convictions on every great question of public concern and moment as any man I ever knew. On nonessential questions, where men might honestly differ, he was as generous and kindly tempered as a woman.

He was as loyal to his convictions and friends as any man that ever lived, and he hated and despised hypocrisy, treachery, and ingratitude, whether in private or public life, as it was possible for a man to do. He was not only intensely loyal to his State and district, of which he never ceased or hesitated to boast with pardonable pride, but he loved his party with an affection which might be equaled but never surpassed, and in that regard his life and record is one which may well be emulated by all members of the great party of which he was an honored member, without regard to State or local lines.

Mr. Speaker, it was never my good fortune to be associated on the same committee with Mr. ERMENTROUT, but from others of my colleagues from New York and other States who were I learned much of his character, abilities, and work. He was a close and careful reader or student of public affairs and kept in close touch with the beliefs, wishes, and sentiments of the people of his district and State, and he never wavered in the least or swerved a hair's breadth from the line he had marked or mapped out for himself as to his duty in regard to any important public question.

It was his boast on one notable occasion that he "stood shoulder to shoulder with 'Sam' Randall in defense and support of the tariff interests of Pennsylvania until his party in national and State conventions decided upon a new policy, and then," said Mr. ERMENTROUT, with solemn uplifted hand, "I go with my party, and if necessary will go out of Congress for so acting and voting." His vote for the "Mills bill," which was made a party question, in the Fiftieth Congress lost him the Democratic nomination to the next (Fifty-first) Congress, but he was amply vindicated by his nomination to the Fifty-fifth and Fifty-sixth Congresses. It is true that he had formidable opposition in his own party to his last two renominations, but he insisted that as a loyal Democrat he must follow his party flag and that its national platform, under the leadership of a Democratic President, was binding on him until a new policy was decided upon.

In that matter he followed the advice and action of his colleagues, Messrs. Buckalew, Scott, Maish, Hall, and Lynch, rather than his colleague, Mr. Sowden, who voted "no," ex-Speaker Randall, who was ill and unable to attend, being paired against the bill. It was this quality of self-sacrifice, Mr. Speaker, which endeared Mr. ERMENTROUT to his colleagues, whether they were Democrats or Republicans. He had their respect, though he might differ with and vote against them, but all had confidence in his rugged honesty, integrity, and purity of purpose, and that was the secret of his great personal popularity in the various Congresses in which he served.

In private and social life Mr. ERMENTROUT was one of the most popular members of the House during his service here. At many social gatherings he was the life and soul of the party. He had an inexhaustible fund of reminiscences and anecdotes, and his keen and ready wit was a match for all who "crossed lances with him." At one of these dinners the brilliant Blackburn, of Kentucky, then just recently elected to the Senate—and who will soon return to it—speaking of the contest over the "Mills bill" in the Fiftieth Congress and of the division in the House thereon, said:

Mr. Chairman, in the House of Representatives of the Fiftieth Congress party lines were rent asunder. Under the brilliant leadership and management of Speaker Carlisle and the distinguished gentleman from Texas who sits on my right [Mr. Mills] the House passed a bill—known as the "Mills bill"—to reduce taxation and simplify the revenue laws. It was supported by every Democratic member of the House save five, three of whom were from New York and two from Pennsylvania. That bill received the support and votes of six Republicans, one of whom [Mr. NELSON, of Minnesota] is now a member of the Senate.

The Democratic members from Pennsylvania were divided. There were but seven in all, and of these the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Randall], who has "crossed to the farther shore" after a long, able, faithful, and honorable service, handsomely rounding out his career with three terms as Speaker of the House of Representatives, captured one of his colleagues, while another distinguished member from Pennsylvania, who sits on my left [Mr. Scott], captured four, the delegation standing five for and two against the "Mills bill." Mr. Chairman, it was once said that the Pennsylvania Democracy was divided into three factions—the Thomas Jefferson and Andrew Jackson Democrats and the Pennsylvania Dutch—thousands of votes being cast in that State every four years directly for Andrew Jackson, who was still thought to be "very much alive." But, Mr. Chairman, I want to add to that list: I would class them as the Pennsylvania Democrats, the Pennsylvania Dutch, the Randall Democrats, and DANIEL ERMENTROUT.

This sally created great laughter, and quick as a flash Mr. ERMENTROUT was on his feet:

Mr. Chairman, I thank the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky for the compliment he has sought to pay me by making me "flock by myself." But, Mr. Chairman, I want him and everybody present to know that on that occasion I "flocked" with the Democratic President of the United States, the Democratic Speaker of the House of Representatives, and, with five exceptions, the entire Democratic membership of the House of Representatives; and I want to say that when the time comes I shall always be found "flocking" with my party and standing on its last national platform if I have to "flock by myself" in the Pennsylvania Democratic delegation. I prefer to be an humble private citizen of Pennsylvania and retain my self-respect through fealty to my party than cast a vote to curry local and temporary favor. Legislation, whether State or national, is, after all, but a compromise, but I shall always be found following the party leader and the party flag.

Three rousing cheers and a tiger were given Mr. ERMENTROUT, and during the last visit he paid to Washington in the summer of 1899 he related the incident to a mutual friend with all the fervor of vigorous youth.

Such, Mr. Speaker, was the character of our departed friend. He had all the nerve, courage, and stubbornness of his race, and an iron will which fought to the bitter end. He hated intrigue and despised all shams. He was open, frank, honest, and manly to his opponents. He wore no mask. He had as positive convictions as any man who ever held a seat upon this floor, and he was always loyal to his convictions. He was not a great debater or orator, but in the committee room or upon the floor of the House as a careful, conscientious, and painstaking worker he had few equals and no superiors. He was a great "persuader," and in his easy, offhand, and friendly way he brought men to side with him where the highest type of eloquence would have failed.

He was a fine student of human nature, and it is said of him by his closest friends that he could go into any community of his district, or in the city of Philadelphia, among a great number of men, and call a large majority by their first names. It was in this way, Mr. Speaker, that he kept himself thoroughly posted as to the condition of affairs in his district and State, and it has also been said that he personally knew more voters than any other single man in public life in Pennsylvania. In his striking personality he embodied many of the traits of his ancestry. He had a most remarkable ability and capacity of making friends, who always remained true to him, and he died as he had lived, a "servant of the people."

It is related of him that his last public appearance was on the Wednesday previous to his death, when at the banquet given by the Reading Press Club to the officers of the Thirty-ninth United States Volunteer Infantry he responded to the toast "The press in politics." But five minutes were allowed each speaker, and Mr. ERMENTROUT said that justice could not possibly be done the subject in that brief period. He stated that in his judgment the press could make or break a man in political life; that it exerted a great influence, which, as a rule, was always exerted on the side of right and justice.

Mr. Speaker, some of his colleagues from Pennsylvania will give more minutely the details of his private life, but it is proper for me to state as a matter of interest that Mr. ERMENTROUT is the seventh Representative "from the old Berks district" who did not serve out his term of office and that he is the third Representative from that district who died in office.

I can not, Mr. Speaker, close my tribute to the memory of DANIEL ERMENTROUT without saying that his death was to me almost a personal bereavement. I had come to look upon him as a safe counselor, whose judgment and friendship could almost always be relied upon with absolute confidence. I have met many of Pennsylvania's prominent citizens of all political parties, and that was the opinion always expressed of him. The Philadelphia Record, the leading Democratic paper of Pennsylvania, contained a notice of his death which so aptly describes his life and character that I give it herewith:

The death of Congressman ERMENTROUT will be learned with sincere regret not only by the citizens of his native county, but also by very many people throughout Pennsylvania. Since his election to the State senate in 1873 he has been a prominent figure in the public affairs and politics of this Commonwealth, and his popularity has been amply attested by his repeated elections to Congress from the Eighth and subsequently from the Ninth Congressional districts.

His genial temperament and sturdy and honest regard for the public interest endeared him to his constituents in Berks and Lehigh counties, and his unfaltering and aggressive adherence to the Democratic party rendered him a favorite and influential figure in the conventions and other public gatherings of the Democracy. During his extended Congressional career he served with ability and fidelity.

Mr. Speaker, we shall miss DANIEL ERMENTROUT, and his district and State will greatly miss him. Men come to and go from Congress and pass out of sight like a disappearing sail on the vast ocean. In the years to come Pennsylvania will send to the National House of Representatives men of ability, eloquence, and learning, but in my judgment she will never send a Representative who loved her with a devotion less selfish or will ever serve his State and constituency with more courage, constancy, and fidelity than did DANIEL ERMENTROUT.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, with all that has been so well and so eloquently expressed here to-day regarding the public life and character of the late lamented DANIEL ERMENTROUT, of Pennsylvania, I sincerely concur, and I would be false to myself and to every dictate of my nature if I did not at this time place on record my humble and heartfelt tribute to the memory of our departed friend and colleague.

The sad and sudden death of Mr. ERMENTROUT was a terrible blow to his bereaved family, shocked the community in which he lived, and grieved beyond expression his numerous friends all over the Union. No one expected it and its announcement came like a thunderbolt from a clear sky to his constituents and to the country.

As a member of this House I knew Mr. ERMENTROUT well. He was my friend and I was his friend. He was a man of strong intellect, of vigorous character, and of high and noble impulses. He was a good man, an honest man, a kind man, and the friend of humanity. I early learned to know him and to love him, to admire his good qualities, and to respect his sterling worth as a public-spirited citizen and faithful servant of the people. He had a warm and a sympathetic heart, a genial, sunshiny nature, and he was always happy when he was trying to help a constituent or doing some kind, generous, and charitable act for a friend. He was a plain man, and he loved the plain people. He understood them and they understood and loved him. He believed with Jefferson in equal rights to all, special privileges to no one. He fought the battle for struggling humanity in its onward march and upward progress, and in public and private life did all he could to make the world better and greater and happier. Thousands and thousands whom he knew and whom he helped mourn his loss, and his departure to the undiscovered country has made the world sadder and poorer.

He came from the grand old Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. He was born and he died on her soil. He was proud of his State, and his State has every reason to be proud of him, to revere his memory, and to point with just pride to the noble record he leaves behind as an incentive to her toiling sons and a priceless legacy to her people.

Lives of great men all remind us
We can make our lives sublime,
And, departing, leave behind us
Footprints on the sands of time.

Footprints which perhaps another
Sailing o'er life's dreary main,
A forlorn and shipwrecked brother,
Seeing, may take heart again.

As a Representative in this House Mr. ERMENTROUT was an able, an active, a conscientious, and a conspicuous member. He was always in his place, and never shirked a responsibility or dodged an issue. He was an indefatigable worker, and the records and the reports of our proceedings testify in silent words to his tireless industry and his great ability, learning, and research.

He was generous to a fault, kind and considerate of the feelings of others, and always a courteous, Christian gentleman. He sympathized with the weak, the helpless, the poor, and the distressed. He commended and applauded success, yet his heart went out to those who struggle and fail. I never knew him to make a disparaging remark of a colleague, and he was ever ready and always willing to aid a new member struggling to pass a bill for the people of his district. He was no fault-finder; he looked at the bright side of the picture of life.

We will miss and mourn dear old DANIEL ERMENTROUT here as the days come and go as much as he is missed and mourned at home. When he died a good and kindly light went out, and we and all the world are sadder for it. As the days come and go we will look in his place on this floor and—

Long for the touch of a vanished hand,
And the sound of a voice that is still.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, if there are no other members prepared to make remarks, I move that the House do now adjourn as a further mark of respect to the memory of my predecessor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MIERS of Indiana). That being provided for already in the resolutions, as a further mark of respect to the late lamented Mr. ERMENTROUT, of Pennsylvania, the House will now stand adjourned.

And accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 947) to create a new division in the eastern judicial district of the State of Tennessee, to report it favorably without amendment. The committee are satisfied that the arrangement will be a saving of expense to the United States instead of being an increased expense. The first of the new terms of the court is to be held the fourth Monday in February. So it is quite important that the bill should pass at once in order to prevent the failure of processes by being wrongly brought. I ask, therefore, that the bill may be now considered.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COURTS IN TEXAS.

Mr. CHILTON. From the Committee on the Judiciary I report back with amendments the bill (H. R. 5076) to amend the first section of an act to change the time and places for the district and circuit courts of the northern district of Texas, approved June 11, 1896. As it is a formal matter entirely, I ask that the bill be put upon its passage.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendments were, in line 6, to strike out the words "as to read as follows" and insert the words "to provide;" and in line 9, after the word "Texas," to strike out the words "shall be composed of the counties hereinafter named, and the terms of the said courts;" so as to make the bill read:

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE AT DUBUQUE, IOWA.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2477) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at Dubuque, Iowa. It is a bill local in its character and will take but a few moments. There will be no objection to it, I think. It was reported by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] from the Committee on Commerce.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, page 3, line 1, after the word "changed," to strike out "or removed;" and in line 3, after the word "as," to strike out "Congress" and insert "the Secretary of War;" so as to read:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, page 3, line 5, after the word "river," to strike out the remainder of the section, in the following words:

And the authority to erect and continue said bridge shall be subject to revocation and modification by law when the public good, in the judgment of Congress, so requires, without any expense or charge to the United States; that said bridge shall not interfere with the free navigation of said river beyond what is necessary in order to carry into effect the rights and privileges hereby granted, and in case of any litigation arising from any obstruction, or alleged obstruction, to the free navigation of said river, the cause may be tried before the circuit court of the United States in and for any district in which any portion of said bridge or obstruction is located.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 3, line 22, before the word "hundred," to strike out "two" and insert "three;" so as to read:

The amendment was agreed to.

The remaining spans shall each give a clear width of waterway of not less than 200 feet and a clear headroom of not less in any case than 10 feet between extreme high-water mark and the lower chords of the superstructure.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The amendment of the Committee on Printing was, after the word "Senate," in line 7, to strike out the remainder of the resolution in the following words:

And that the photographs accompanying the same, illustrative and as a part thereof, be photo-engraved or stereotyped to accompany the said report as a part thereof.

On the requisition of the chairman of such committee and to each justice of the supreme court of the District of Columbia on his written request.

Mr. HOAR. There is another court in the District of Columbia, is there not now, the court of appeals, which should also have copies?

Mr. PLATT of New York. Does the Senator propose an amendment?

Mr. HOAR. I suggest that it read "to each justice of the several courts of the District of Columbia."

Mr. PLATT of New York. Very good. I have no objection to that amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts suggests an amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. Strike out in the committee amendment the words "the supreme court" and insert the words "several courts;" so as to read: "on the requisition of the chairman of such committee and to each justice of the several courts of the District of Columbia on his written request."

Mr. COCKRELL. Now let the joint resolution be read as it will stand if amended.

REPORT ON AFFAIRS IN CUBA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a concurrent resolution amended by the House of Representatives. The resolution and amendment will be read.

The Secretary read the concurrent resolution as passed by the Senate on the 9th ultimo, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 7,000 copies of so much of the civil report of Maj. Gen. John R. Brooke, military governor of the island of Cuba, made to the Adjutant-General of the United States Army, with accompanying papers and documents, as is in the English language, together with a prepared index; of which 2,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 4,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,000 copies for the use of the War Department.

The amendment of the House of Representatives was, in line 3, to strike out the word "report" and insert the word "reports."

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

LANDS ON THE ISLAND OF OAHU, HAWAII.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 76) withdrawing certain lands on the island of Oahu, Hawaii, from the public domain, to report it favorably, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read for information.

The Secretary read the joint resolution.

Mr. FORAKER. I understand that a joint resolution in regard to certain lands on the island of Oahu, Hawaii, has been reported from the Committee on Public Lands. I was not aware there was any such resolution pending before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a report from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FORAKER. When was that joint resolution introduced?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It was introduced something like a week ago, when it was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and it has been unanimously reported from that committee. It is with reference to the withdrawal from the public lands of the royal mausoleum, containing something like 120,000 square feet in the outskirts of Honolulu.

Mr. FORAKER. I must certainly have been absent from the Senate when that joint resolution was introduced and referred to the Committee on Public Lands. As chairman of the Committee on Pacific Islands and Puerto Rico, I shall insist that all matters affecting those islands shall be referred to the committee having control of that subject.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Certainly the Senator from Ohio will see the justice of having referred this matter to the Committee on Public Lands, when by resolution and a proclamation of the President the public lands of Hawaii have been taken over to the United States. It seems to me that there is but one committee to which that joint resolution and that subject should have gone. It certainly was not such a reference of the joint resolution as could properly have been objected to, I think.

Mr. FORAKER. It may be as the Senator from Wyoming says; I have no doubt it is; but I did not happen to be present when the joint resolution was introduced and was not aware that any such resolution had been introduced or any such reference had been made.

I only want to say, as chairman of that committee, that everything affecting those islands the Committee on Pacific Islands and Puerto Rico will feel inclined to claim should be referred to it. If everything affecting the public lands in those islands is to go to the Committee on Public Lands, if everything referring to finance is to go to the Finance Committee, and everything referring to navigation is to go to the Committee on Commerce, we might as well dispense with the Committee on Pacific Islands and Puerto Rico. We shall claim the reference of everything of this character, in the first instance, to that committee.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I had no thought of discourtesy to the Senator or to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Puerto Rico.

Mr. FORAKER. I am sure of that. I am not disposed to make any question on this joint resolution; but, as I have already said,

I want to serve notice that our committee will make claim to everything connected with those islands in the way of legislation that may be brought before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. ALLEN. I object. I think morning business ought to be transacted before anything else is taken up.

ADMISSIONS TO GOVERNMENT HOSPITAL FOR THE INSANE.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Committee on Military Affairs agreed to report favorably the bill (S. 2383) to amend section 4843 of the Revised Statutes, but at the same time we received from the House of Representatives exactly the same bill, word for word. I move that the Senate bill be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut to postpone indefinitely the bill named by him.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. I now ask the Senate to take up and concur in the passage of the House bill (H. R. 5491) to amend section 4843 of the Revised Statutes, which I report favorably from the Committee on Military Affairs.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to amend section 4843 of the Revised Statutes by inserting the word "Pay" in line 8 after the word "Quartermaster's;" so that the paragraph will read:

Second. Civilians employed in the Quartermaster's, Pay, and Subsistence Departments of the Army who may be, or may hereafter become, insane while in such employment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

I move that the hearing be printed and that 1,000 extra copies be printed for the use of the Committee on Commerce.

SOLDIERS' MONUMENT AT TALLADEGA, ALA.

Mr. MORGAN. I present the memorial of the Andrew Jackson Chapter of the Daughters of the American Revolution, of Talladega, Ala., asking the assistance of Congress in the very patriotic and noble work of removing the remains of 15 soldiers who fell in the battle of Talladega, November 9, 1813, under the command of Gen. Andrew Jackson. A limestone wall was built about the remains, which are all buried in one grave, and upon that the early pioneers in that part of the world erected a superstructure of wood, which has all fallen down. The walls have tumbled, and within a hundred yards of this place there has been established a very large and extensive iron works, so that it remains no longer a proper place of sepulture for those soldiers.

The ladies of Talladega who belong to the chapter I have mentioned have already raised some subscriptions for the purpose of reinterring the remains of those soldiers and building over them a modest monument of Talladega marble.

There is a very interesting piece of history connected with that struggle in the destiny of man, amongst whom was Lieutenant Barton, a man of conspicuous gallantry, and also a man whose name I can not recall, who died by the side of David Crockett, Crockett afterwards having married his widow and come to Congress.

I ask that the memorial may be printed as a document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made, in the absence of objection.

Mr. MORGAN. I also introduce a joint resolution, which is based upon the memorial.

The joint resolution (S. R. 82) for erecting a monument to the soldiers who fell in the battle of Talladega, Ala., on the 9th day of November, 1813, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Library, and the memorial which the Senator has presented will be referred to the same committee and printed as a document, in the absence of objection. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

THE NATIONAL WHITE CROSS.

Mr. STEWART. I ask that the bill (S. 2581) to incorporate the National White Cross of America, and for other purposes, which was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia some days ago with the recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, be now referred to the latter committee. I hope that the change of reference will be made, as it is satisfactory to all Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, in the absence of objection. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

PROCEEDINGS OF NAVAL COURTS-MARTIAL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is closed, and the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. PETTUS February 1, 1900, as modified, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy is directed to inform the Senate whether the Navy Department has or has not refused or refrained to communicate to the Court of Claims any information concerning proceedings of naval courts-martial, on the call of said court, under section 1076 of the Revised Statutes; and if so, his reasons therefor.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, this resolution asking for information as to the practice in one of the great Departments of the Government was offered in the utmost good faith and without in anyway reflecting or intending to reflect on anyone. The Secretary of the Navy, so far as I know or have ever heard, is an honorable gentleman, intending to discharge his duties according to law, but he might make a mistake. It has never been my habit to make charges or insinuations against officers, and I hope I never will make any such charges without the best foundation for making them. We all know that sailors on our men of war are subject to the most rigid discipline. It has always been so, and it is believed to be necessary that it should continue. The commander of a ship of war at sea is almost a monarch. His orders must be obeyed for the safety of the ship and the good of the service. Thus subject to the iron rule of necessity, do not these sailors need and deserve your most diligent protection?

The American sailors do deserve your protection. Since 1776 they have always been on the danger line, whenever there was danger, either from the wrath of the sea or our national enemies on the great waters. And from Paul Jones to George Dewey the sailors, commanded by American naval officers, have been the equals of any other sailors who ever went down to the sea in ships and the superiors of all sailors mentioned in history who did not speak the English language. These American sailors, under educated, brave, and faithful officers, have protected this Republic from its birth to its present full-grown and glorious manhood, and for such services they deserve your most watchful and scrutinizing protection, and they need that kind of protection from the Congress of the United States. We all know that the sailors as a class are imprudent even to recklessness in what merely concerns their personal interest. They know nothing of the maxims of caution or "ill-timed prudence" or the gathering of pounds shillings and pence, by hook or by crook, or what the moralists call overreaching. They are even said to entertain no sufficient veneration for the temperance societies. In short, they do not know how to live, but they know how to work the ship under orders and how to stand to their guns, and more than all, these American sailors know how to die—how to die for their country as heroes and patriots die.

These American sailors deserve and need your protection. They can not protect themselves. The law of the land is the only protection they can have. Thus under necessarily stern control and subject to punishment by naval courts-martial, more or less severe, but regulated by law, how are these sailors to be properly protected unless they can procure easy access to the proceedings of naval courts-martial, under the findings and sentences of which they are punished? The law makes copies of those proceedings legal evidence if relevant, and the law gives the Court of Claims the power to call on the Departments for papers and information and makes it the duty of the Departments to furnish what is called for by the court unless the officer called on by the court believes that to do so would be against the public interest. This was evidently so provided so as to guard state secrets, as they are called; but I am unable to conceive how the proceedings of a naval court-martial by which a sailor has been tried, after the finding has been approved and after the sailor has been punished, can be a state secret or ought to be a secret of any kind. I am satisfied that such proceedings should always be open to the inspection of every person interested and to the public, under proper regulations, like the judgments of all civil courts of the United States.

Mr. President, we need a strong Navy, and the United States ought to have a strong Navy, with or without the permission of those who manufacture steel plates. Our Navy ought to be strengthened now or as soon as practicable. We ought to have better and more ships. We ought to have our Naval Academy improved and enlarged, so as to have educated officers sufficient to command the ships which we ought to build. We ought also to have a regular system by which all the officers of the Navy and others who, for skillful conduct and for level-headed daring, stand, like Saul, head and shoulders above their fellows, can be rewarded. They ought to be rewarded by honors. Honors ought to be crowded on them. What for? To encourage others to go and do likewise.

Mr. President, these officers, when thus encouraged, learn how to, and they will solve the great problems of war. When we were discussing the war and after the war had commenced, do not Senators remember the one serious, the one alarming problem that was introduced into that war which had never been found before? The question was, How are we to protect our naval vessels from the power of the Spanish torpedo boats? That was the question. It was really the only alarming question there was in it, and that question was solved like a problem in Euclid by one of our naval officers. Wainwright solved the problem. It was very simple. Get a fast yacht and the best crew you can get and stand to your guns, and that solved the problem. That was the only real, substantial danger that we feared, and it had never been solved before. This one officer solved that great problem, and we want an educated number from Annapolis to solve others as they may present themselves. Mr. President, but all these officers and all these guns and all the ships that you can build are of no substantial value unless you have sailors to stand by the guns. These sailors need your protection. They are, as it were, infants and helpless in themselves to protect their own rights.

All I want to know by this resolution is whether the sailors can go to that Department or send to that Department and get a record of the proceedings of a court-martial by which they were tried. That is all I want to know. The court orders it. I do not know of my own knowledge whether it has been furnished or not, but I have reasons for the inquiry, and I should like to add a line to the resolution by way of amendment, if the Secretary will be kind enough to write it down.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama has a right to modify his resolution.

Mr. PETTUS. I wish to insert the words:

And the Secretary of the Navy will also inform the Senate as to the practice of the Navy in reference to the examination of proceedings of courts-martial on the application of parties interested or their authorized agents.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, it gives me great pleasure to concur in the eulogium pronounced by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] upon the American sailor, and to thank him for the sentiments which he has so appropriately expressed in behalf of a newer and larger and better Navy.

With reference to the pending resolution calling upon the Secretary of the Navy to inform the Senate whether or not he has refrained from answering calls for information made by the Court of Claims, not believing that the Secretary had for insufficient reasons omitted to comply with any such request, I communicated with him and received from him certain correspondence, which I submitted to the Senator from Alabama. That correspondence shows, I think, that there has been no omission or refusal to transmit information required by the Court of Claims in cases pending before them, and that the course pursued by the Navy Department with reference to calls supposed to be either frivolous or proceeding from ulterior motives was approved by the Court of Claims itself.

Mr. President, notwithstanding that this information has been furnished to the Senator from Alabama, there can be no objection to the passage of the resolution, if the Senator from Alabama so desires.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution submitted by the Senator from Alabama as modified.

The resolution as modified, was agreed to.

TRANSACTIONS BETWEEN TREASURY DEPARTMENT AND BANKS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day.

The resolution submitted by Mr. ALLEN on the 2d instant was read, as follows:

Resolved, That a special committee, consisting of nine members of the Senate, be immediately appointed by the President pro tempore to make a thorough and complete investigation of all dealings and transactions between the Secretary of the Treasury or the Treasury Department of the United States and the National City Bank and the Hanover National Bank, of the city of New York, or any other national bank of the United States, from the 4th day of March, 1897, to the present time, and especially in regard to all letters, agreements, papers, or documents between the Treasury Department of the United States, or any person connected therewith, and the National City Bank and the Hanover National Bank, of the city of New York, or any person acting for them, or either of them, since the 4th day of March, 1897, relating to the depositing of public funds, bonds, or revenues in said bank or banks; or any other relations or business transactions now existing or heretofore had between the Government and the said banks, or either of them, and the amount of public money, bonds, or revenue deposited with said banks, or either of them, or with any national bank, by the Government, upon what security, for what length of time, and the reasons therefor, and whether said banks, or any of them, have paid the Government any interest on said deposits, and if so, how much, and all other information concerning the same or in any way relating thereto; and also the date of the sale of the custom-house property of the United States in New York City to said National City Bank, the date of the execution of the deed thereto, the date and manner of payment of the purchase money therefor, the disposition of the proceeds of said sale, and whether or not the Government has paid any rents for said property, or any portion thereof, for any purpose since the day of sale, and if so, to whom, and all facts relating to said transaction, and all other matters in connection therewith or in any way relating thereto; and said committee is authorized to send for persons, books, letters, telegrams, papers, documents, and agreements, administer oaths, and hold open sessions, and sit at any time in any place in the city of Washington, New York, or Chicago, the expense for the same to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and the Sergeant-at-Arms, or some one acting for him, shall attend said committee and carry out its mandates; and said committee is instructed to make a report to the Senate, with testimony and exhibits, with all convenient speed.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not want to disappoint the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY] who has given notice of his intention to speak to-day. So I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may go over, retaining its place.

Mr. SPOONER. Also the other resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is another resolution, offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW], which is in the same position.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] is not here.

Mr. SPOONER. Let that take the same course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska asks that the two resolutions coming over from a former day may go over without prejudice, retaining their place.

Mr. SPOONER. There is another resolution which was offered by the Senator from Nebraska and which he discussed the other day.

Mr. ALDRICH. That has gone to the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That resolution had its day and is on the Calendar.

Mr. SPOONER. It can be taken up by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska? In the absence of objection, the order is entered.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

Mr. TURNER. Mr. President, I wish to announce that to-morrow, after the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER], I shall ask the Senate to hear me make some remarks on the bill now pending as the unfinished business.

POLICY REGARDING THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, I ask that Senate joint resolution 45 may now be read.

The joint resolution (S. R. 45) declaring the purpose of the United States with reference to the Philippine Islands, introduced by Mr. BACON December 18, 1899, was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Government and people of the United States have not waged the recent war with Spain for conquest and for the acquisition of foreign territory, but solely for the purposes set forth in the resolution of Congress making the declaration of war—the acquisition of such small tracts of land or harbors as may be necessary for governmental purposes being not deemed inconsistent with the same.

SEC. 2. That in demanding and in receiving the cession of the Philippine Islands it is not the purpose of the Government of the United States to secure and maintain permanent dominion over the same as a part of the territory of the United States, or to permanently incorporate the inhabitants thereof as citizens of the United States, or to hold said inhabitants as vassals or subjects of this Government; and the United States hereby disclaim any disposition or intention to exercise permanent sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said islands.

SEC. 3. That the United States having accepted the cession of the Philippine Islands from Spain, and having by force of arms overthrown all organized authority and opposition to the authority of the United States therein, the duty and obligation rest upon the United States to restore peace and maintain order throughout the same; to protect in said islands the enjoyment of life and property and the pursuit of lawful avocations; and to continue such protection until the power and duty to maintain said protection shall have been transferred and intrusted by the United States to a government of the people of said islands deemed capable and worthy to exercise said power and discharge said duty.

SEC. 4. That when armed resistance to the authority of the United States shall have ceased within said islands, and peace and order shall have been restored therein, it is the purpose and intention of the United States, so soon thereafter as the same can be practically and safely accomplished, to provide the opportunity and prescribe the method for the formation of a government by and of the people of the Philippine Islands, to be thereafter independently exercised and controlled by themselves, it being the design of the United States to accord to the people of said islands the same measure of liberty and independence which have been pledged by the Congress of the United States to the people of Cuba.

SEC. 5. That when a stable government shall, by the method aforesaid, have been duly formed and erected in said islands, competent and worthy, in the judgment of the United States, to exercise the powers of an independent government and to preserve peace and maintain order within its jurisdiction, it is the purpose and intention of the United States, reserving to themselves only such harbors and tracts of land as may be needed for coaling stations or other governmental purposes, to transfer to said government, upon terms which shall be reasonable and just, all rights and territory secured in said islands under the treaty with Spain, and to thereupon leave the dominion and control of the islands to their people.

SEC. 6. That when said government has been thus formed and set up in the Philippine Islands and approved by the United States, it is the design and intention of the United States, through such means and measures as may be deemed most efficient and appropriate, to secure the guaranty of the continued independence of the same.

Mr. CAFFERY. Let the Secretary now read Senate joint resolution No. 53.

The joint resolution (S. R. 53) defining the policy of the United States relative to the Philippine Islands, introduced by Mr. BEVERIDGE January 4, 1900, was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Philippine Islands are territory belonging to the United States; that it is the intention of the United States to retain them as such and to establish and maintain such governmental control throughout the archipelago as the situation may demand.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, these two resolutions in regard to the Philippine Islands, one by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] and the other by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE], embrace the opposing views held by members of the Senate and the people at large in the United States on this very difficult and embarrassing question.

The joint resolution of the Senator from Georgia substantially provides for the abandonment of the Philippine Islands by the United States, so far as its sovereignty is concerned, and the establishment there conjointly by the United States and the Filipinos of a republican form of government, an independent government under the control of the Filipinos themselves. The resolution of the Senator from Indiana, which is very short and very comprehensive, is as follows:

That the Philippine Islands are territory belonging to the United States; that it is the intention of the United States to retain them as such and to establish and maintain such governmental control throughout the archipelago as the situation may demand.

Here is the proposition boldly stated that the Philippine Islands belong to the United States, and that they shall be held for all time as Territories and shall be governed in such manner as the Congress of the United States may deem proper. So, therefore, we have the question presented by these two resolutions as to the power of Congress to establish within the Territories of the United States just such a government as they may please to adopt, and that government to be maintained indefinitely.

From that proposition I dissent, and, Mr. President, in view of the substantial adoption of that proposition by the Secretary of War and in view of the proposed regulations which I am told are being prepared to establish in Puerto Rico different tariff rates from those observed throughout the United States, I deem it proper to consider the questions of constitutional right assumed in the resolution of the Senator from Indiana and in the report of the Secretary of War.

No more momentous question has ever occupied the attention of the American Congress. No more momentous question can occupy it. The question is, broadly presented, whether or not, by implication from an obscure section of the Constitution, the Congress of the United States can exercise sovereign jurisdiction and power over whatever territory may be acquired by the United States.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Louisiana allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Upon what theory does the Senator from Louisiana call any provision in the Constitution of the United States an obscure provision?

Mr. CAFFERY. I call it an obscure provision because I believe it is only a provision for administration of Territories, and not a provision conferring any such power as is assumed. I believe that the provision in the Constitution giving power to Congress to make rules and regulations for the government of territory is simply a power to administer the laws of the United States so far as they may be applicable to that territory.

The question as to who may, in a Territory, for a temporary purpose, administer such laws is secondary.

Mr. President, I will quote from the report of the Secretary of War, page 26:

I assume, for I do not think it can be successfully disputed, that all acquisition of territory under this treaty was the exercise of a power which belonged to the United States, because it was a nation, and for that reason was endowed with the powers essential to national life, and that the United States has all the powers in respect of a territory which it has thus acquired, and the inhabitants of that territory, which any nation in the world has in respect of territory which it has acquired; that as between the people of the ceded islands and the United States the former are subject to the complete sovereignty of the latter, controlled by no legal limitations except those which may be found in the treaty of cession; that the people of the islands have no right to have them treated as States, or to have them treated as the territories previously held by the United States have been treated, or to assert a legal right under the provisions of the Constitution which was established for the people of the United States themselves and to meet the conditions existing upon this continent, or to assert against the United States any legal right whatever not found in the treaty.

I now skip a portion of it.

The people of the ceded islands have acquired a moral right to be treated by the United States in accordance with the underlying principles of justice and freedom which we have declared in our Constitution, which are the essential safeguards of every individual against the powers of government, not because those provisions were enacted for them, but because they are essential limitations inherent in the very existence of the American Government.

In another part of this report it is stated that there is no constitutional right upon the part of the Puerto Ricans to have free trade with the United States, but that the United States may establish whatever duties it pleases upon the import of articles from Puerto Rico into the United States and the import of articles into Puerto Rico from the United States and foreign countries, and that regardless of our revenue laws. He says further that on account of the financial and industrial conditions existing in Puerto Rico the tariff ought to be modified and that the Puerto Ricans ought to be allowed to import into the United States their produce free from any tax or tariff on the part of the United States, but that is only in consideration of the deplorable industrial condition that prevails in the island.

Mr. President, even the natural rights of man, rights which belong to him without constitutions, are denied as constitutional rights to the people of the Territories. By grace, by the influence of moral considerations, by the inspirations of constitutional liberty we may be impelled to grant to the people of Puerto Rico the exercise of the rights guaranteed in the bill of rights of the Constitution, but there is no constitutional guaranty; there is no operation of the Constitution in the territory of Puerto Rico proprio vigore. Those rights inherent in mankind have been denied and abused by tyrants. They may be abused and denied again.

So we have this broad question to consider. I do not deny that the United States is a nation; I do not deny that the United States possess all the rights of nationality in every way and in every regard, but I do deny that the Congress of the United States possesses the sovereign rights of the sovereign people of America.

I claim that the fountain of all supreme right, the foundation of all sovereignty, is in the political unit called the people. I deny that there is any expressed grant of the sovereign power assumed nor any by reasonable or necessary implication, and I deny that there is anywhere in any department of the Government an unlimited, sovereign, despotic power. The people of the United States framed the Declaration of Independence and announced a principle in the beginning of their national life which is the foundation stone of all republican government. We violated that elemental principle in taking over the sovereignty of the Philippines without their consent. Afterwards the people of the United States formed a representative government. A representative government is necessarily based upon the consent of the governed. I contend that there is no power anywhere outside of the people of the United States, no power in any branch of government or in all the branches combined to make any other than a representative government in any territory which may be acquired by war or by cession.

Now, Mr. President, I will first inquire what is meant by citizenship of the United States? Who is a citizen of the United States? Have we alien subjects in the Territories and citizens within the confines of the present Union? Does it not necessarily follow that everybody who owes allegiance to the United States is a member of the political community of the United States, and therefore a citizen of the United States, and therefore entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities of citizens of the United States?

That proposition, Mr. President, I propose to discuss. I quote from Cooley's Constitutional Law, pages 254, 255:

Citizenship in State and Union: The fourteenth amendment recognizes the fact that there is a citizenship of the United States and also a citizenship of the several States, and that the two coexist in the same persons. Both governments owe a duty of protection to the persons who are subject to their jurisdiction, and both are entitled to the allegiance of such persons, and may punish breaches of this allegiance. It is impossible to conceive of such a status as citizenship of a State unconnected with citizenship of the United States, or of citizenship of the United States within a State unconnected with citizenship of the State. The States can not naturalize, though they may confer special privileges upon aliens; and the act of naturalization by the United States is the grant of citizenship within the State where the naturalized person resides. It is only in the Territories and other places subject to their exclusive jurisdiction that there can be a citizenship of the United States unconnected with citizenship of a State.

Now, Mr. President, after stating broadly the distinction between citizenship of a State and citizenship of the United States, and that both of these different kinds of citizenship may coexist, Cooley lays down the proposition that the citizens of the Territories are citizens of the United States exclusively and not citizens of any State. Of course that needs no argument to prove. Now, then, he continues, on the same page:

Naturalization may be effected, first, by special laws which confer the privilege upon individuals named; second, by proceeding under general laws, whereby individuals renounce any foreign allegiance and take upon themselves the obligations of citizenship; third, by the acquisition by the United States of foreign territory, with its people, who thereby become citizens of the United States. In this manner the citizens brought within the jurisdiction of the Union by the acquisition of Louisiana, Florida, and portions of Mexico became citizens. The second method above named is that provided by acts of Congress, and the first and third must always be exceptional.

Now, Judge Cooley does not say that in the cases cited the citizenship was conferred by treaty. Judge Cooley says that the citizenship was obtained by the mere acquisition of these Territories, and that principle, in my mind, is undoubtedly correct.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not know whether the Senator from Louisiana desires any interruption or not. I will not interrupt him if he does not desire it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. What Judge Cooley says there was written since the acquisition of Alaska. Now, why was it that Judge Cooley, in referring to the Territories, omits any reference to Alaska?

Mr. CAFFERY. I suppose that that was a mere lapsus of memory.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I guess not.

Mr. CAFFERY. Judge Cooley has stated enough to embrace Alaska within the principle. Judge Cooley need not have cited any case at all. The citizenship of Alaska, I believe, was provided for in the treaty between Russia and the United States.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It differed from the other treaties in that it did not provide that the inhabitants were to be incorporated into the Union.

Mr. CAFFERY. If they were citizens of the United States, Mr. President, they would, soon after arriving at a position or condition of statehood, be admitted as a State without any provision in the Russian treaty.

Mr. SPOONER. Of course.

Mr. CAFFERY. Now, I will quote Judge Bradley (16 Wallace, page 119):

But even if the Constitution were silent—

Speaking of these individual and personal rights—

the fundamental privileges and immunities of citizens, as such, would be no less real and no less inviolable than they are now. It was not necessary to say in words that the citizens of the United States should have and exercise all the privileges of citizens—the privilege of buying, selling, and enjoying property; the privilege of engaging in any lawful employment for a livelihood; the privilege of resorting to the laws for redress of injuries and the like. Their very citizenship conferred these privileges, if they did not possess them before. And these privileges they would enjoy whether they were citizens of any State or not. Inhabitants of Federal Territories and new citizens, made such by annexation of territory or naturalization, though without any status as citizens of a State, could, nevertheless, as citizens of the United States, lay claim to every one of the privileges and immunities which have been enumerated, and among these none is more essential and fundamental than the right to follow such profession as each one may choose, subject only to uniform regulations equally applicable to all.

Now, then, Mr. President, Judge Bradley says nothing of citizenship conferred by treaty stipulations. He broadly says that we make citizens of the United States by the acquisition of territory, and by the fact of annexing of territory to the United States. In the course of the decision he says that citizens of the United States enjoy the fundamental rights of citizens of States without the necessity of these being incorporated into the Constitution by amendment. In my opinion, inhabitants of Territories become citizens of the United States by the very fact of the United States claiming and exercising sovereignty over them. They may be unwilling citizens; they may be forced into the United States, as they have been by the annexation of the Philippine Islands; but they none the less become citizens ipso facto by reason of the United States flag floating over them, and the paramount sovereignty of the United States, made good over them by fire and sword.

Mr. Chief Justice Waite, in United States vs. Cruikshank, page 549, says:

We have in our political system a Government of the United States and a government of each of the several States. Each one of these governments is distinct from the others, and each has citizens of its own who owe it allegiance, and whose rights, within its jurisdiction, it must protect. The same person may be at the same time a citizen of the United States and a citizen of a State—

Quoting from Judge Bradley—

but his rights of citizenship under one of these governments will be different from those he has under the other. (Slaughterhouse Cases, 16 Wall., 74.)

Citizens are the members of the political community to which they belong. They are the people who compose the community and who, in their associated capacity, have established or submitted themselves to the dominion of a government for the promotion of their general welfare and the protection of their individual as well as their collective rights. In the formation of a government the people may confer upon it such powers as they choose. The government when so formed may, and when called upon should, exercise all powers it has for the protection of the rights of its citizens and the people within its jurisdiction, but it can exercise no other. The duty of a government to afford protection is limited always by the power it possesses for that purpose.

And Mr. Chief Justice Fuller, in Boyd vs. Thayer (143 United States), says:

Manifestly the nationality of the inhabitants of territory acquired by conquest or cession becomes that of the government under whose dominion they pass, subject to the right of election on their part to retain their former nationality by removal or otherwise, as may be provided.

Now, the proposition is distinctly asserted that citizens are members of the political community to which they belong. What political community do these territorial inhabitants belong to? They have no community. They had a community, but we have destroyed it. There was a Filipino government. There was, in my opinion, a de facto government, possessing all the essential elements of government. But that government has been destroyed by fire and sword. The forces of the United States, unequaled the world over for valor and military skill, have, as we all knew they would, vanquished the Filipinos.

Now, then, if these Filipinos are not members of our political community, are they waifs floating about in the political world without a home, without a nationality? If they should be trespassed upon by a foreign power, if Great Britain to-day or any foreign power in the world should spoliate or oppress the Philippine people, would we not be compelled, by reason of their nationality, as members of our political community, to redress the wrong and prevent the oppression? Could we claim that they were citizens of the United States for the purpose of protection and disclaim this citizenship for the purpose of any participation on their part in the rights and immunities of citizens of the United States? No, sir; they are citizens entirely, completely, absolutely. A subject and a citizen are the same. Citizenship is only one of the terms applied to a member of a political community. If the Filipinos are not members of the political community of the United States, what are they? And if they are members of the political community of the United States, the Constitution, proprio vigore, carries there in the Philippines every single one of the rights guaranteed to American citizens in all the amendments to the Constitution.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Louisiana allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I think the Senator knows that I have always great respect for his opinions, and I certainly always listen to him with great interest. I should like to ask him his view as to this particular phase of the question he is discussing. As I understand it, the Senator contends that where foreign territory is acquired by treaty any provision in the treaty as affecting the status of the inhabitants of the acquired territory so far as citizenship is concerned is inefficacious.

Mr. CAFFERY. I think it is surplusage; yes, sir.

Mr. SPOONER. But as a matter of law, the inhabitants become citizens of the United States.

Mr. CAFFERY. That is what I assert.

Mr. SPOONER. And are entitled to the individual rights guaranteed by the Constitution to citizens of the United States.

Mr. CAFFERY. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPOONER. Now, assuming, for the purposes of the argument, that to be true, does the Senator go further and insist that they are thereby entitled under the Constitution to any particular form of government——

Mr. CAFFERY. I do.

Mr. SPOONER. Provided that the form of government which is given to them does not interfere with those rights essential in a citizen to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness?

Mr. CAFFERY. I do not exactly understand the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. I understood the Senator to say a little while ago that the inhabitants of a Territory belonging to the United States are entitled to a representative government.

Mr. CAFFERY. They are; that is just exactly what I contended for.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator regard our government of Alaska as unconstitutional?

Mr. CAFFERY. I do not.

Mr. SPOONER. Is it a representative government in his view?

Mr. CAFFERY. It is not.

Mr. SPOONER. Then it must be unconstitutional.

Mr. CAFFERY. No, sir; I beg your pardon. When we acquire territory that has not at the moment of acquisition or for some time after the character and the condition of statehood, Congress must exercise a kind of tutorship over that territory. There is a kind of intermediary condition. Congress is the guardian of that territory. But the territory must possess the ingredients of representative government ultimately.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will permit me, I was not speaking——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield?

Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I did not have in mind in the question I put the subject of statehood. I was referring to the form of Territorial or quasi Territorial government.

Mr. CAFFERY. If you mean by your question that Congress can impose upon the Territories any other than a form of free government——

Mr. SPOONER. Of course I did not mean that.

Mr. CAFFERY. Then I shall answer that they have no such power. Congress has heretofore sedulously guarded the rights of the citizens of the Territories.

The Territory of Louisiana has been quoted as an evidence of the power of Congress to impose just what sort of government they pleased, but that case does not bear out the contention. It is not necessary to clothe the inhabitants of a Territory with the political right of franchise until they are fitted for it. But I do contend, and that goes back to the original contention that we had when the treaty with Spain was pending, that whatever territory the United States acquires it must govern that territory under the constitutional limitations, not by grace, as the Secretary of War says, but by the binding and coercive force of these constitutional rights.

There is no grace about it, sir. Every man who belongs to the political community of the United States is constitutionally under the protection of the Constitution so far as individual rights go. They can not be infringed; they can not be set aside. There is no implication about it, as Judge Bradley says. There is no grace about it, as my friend from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], I believe, advocated. But there is the constitutional prerogative and right to these different constitutional privileges guaranteed in the Constitution itself.

Now, Mr. President, what particular rights of citizenship have been recognized by the Supreme Court? The right of free locomotion is one. The right of trial by jury is another. These rights have been passed upon by the Supreme Court and recognized as constitutional rights; and if the Constitution extends proprio vigore in the matter of these personal rights, how can you curtail its operation in the great principle of representative government?

Are you going to carry one part of the Constitution to the Philippines and leave another part at home? Are you going to guarantee to the Filipinos the right of trial by jury, the right to bear arms, the right of free access to the United States and of free egress therefrom, and are you going to deny them, after granting them these rights, the right of a representative form of government? The rights are one; they are inseparable and indivisible rights. You can not divide them. You can not separate them. The Constitution, proprio vigore, goes everywhere that the United States have established their power. In Murphy vs. Ramsey (114 U. S. Reports, page 44) Mr. Justice Matthews says:

> The personal and civil rights of the inhabitants of the Territories are secured to them, as to other citizens, by the principles of constitutional liberty, which restrain all the agencies of government, State and national. If we concede that this discretion in Congress is limited by the obvious purposes for which it was conferred, and that those purposes are satisfied by measures which prepare the people of the Territories to become States in the Union, still the conclusion can not be avoided that the act of Congress here in question is clearly within that justification.

So again, in The Mormon Church vs. The United States (136 U. S., page 44), Mr. Justice Bradley says:

> Doubtless Congress in legislating for the Territories would be subject to those fundamental limitations in favor of personal rights which are formulated in the Constitution and its amendments, but these limitations would exist rather by inference and the general spirit of the Constitution from which Congress derives all its powers than by express and direct application of its provisions.

Now, Judge Bradley does not say that these provisions of the Constitution guaranteeing personal rights do not exist in the Territories, but he says they do not exist there by direct application of these rights, but rather by inference. Now, then, Justices Fuller, Field, and Lamar dissented from this proposition, and stated:

> Congress possesses such authority over the Territories as the Constitution expressly or by clear implication delegates. * * * but the power of Congress to legislate over the Territories is granted in so many words by the Constitution. (Article IV, section 3, clause 2.)
> In my opinion Congress—
> In my opinion Congress is restrained, not merely by the limitations expressed in the Constitution, but also by the absence of any grant of power express or implied, in that instrument. * * * I regard it of vital consequence that absolute power should never be conceded as belonging under our system of government to any one of the departments. The legislative power of Congress is delegated and not inherent, and is therefore limited.

There is a great deal of difference between the inherent power of a nation and the inherent power of one of the functionaries of that nation. Our Constitution is a Constitution of grants, of enumerated, specific grants. The people of the United States, when they formed this Constitution, did not grant to any one of these departments of Government or to all combined any absolute authority. Absolute authority and absolute sovereignty only exist with the people of the United States.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Will the Senator from Louisiana permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CAFFERY. Yes, sir.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. How can the people of the United States exercise that sovereign authority except through Congress or by amendment?

Mr. CAFFERY. The people of the United States have granted to the Congress of the United States sufficient sovereign power to govern these United States and all territory that the United States may acquire. The Congress of the United States can not exercise any other authority than that contained in the Constitution. There is no inherent power anywhere in any of the departments of the Government. That is a false and a pernicious principle. That principle has been denounced from the commencement of our Government until now; that principle is a principle of despotism and arbitrary rule; that principle creeps into republics when they take the downward course of empire. The Congress of the United States is given unlimited power to make laws for certain purposes only. The Congress of the United States can make laws to govern the Territories. I quite agree with my friend from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], who advanced the proposition that the power to acquire necessarily involved the power to govern even if the Constitution had been silent. I agree with that proposition. But govern how? Govern according to the caprice or according to the unchecked volition of Congress? No, sir; govern according to the Constitution of the United States; govern in that way, and in that way only; give to the Territories just that sort of a government under the Constitution that their condition requires. But Congress can not impose upon the Territories any sort of government they choose.

Let me suppose a case, Mr. President. Suppose the cession of the Northwest Territory to the old Confederation in 1787 had had no provision that that Territory was to be carved into States, and when Congress became the heir of the Confederacy they erected governments in that Territory, and governed the inhabitants without regard to the Constitution or the amendments, and offered them no hope for a government of their own, I want to know whether or not the Congress of the United States could have established such a government there? I want to know if the treaty between France and the United States providing for the incorporation of the Louisiana territory into the Union and providing for citizenship of the inhabitants had not contained those provisions, whether an empire could have been established in the States carved out of that territory; whether Congress would have had the unlimited power to govern that territory as it chose under any laws that it might desire to adopt, and to exercise all the rights that are now claimed to be inherent?

What are inherent rights? Where do they come from under our Constitution? You can not locate one single inherent right in any one of the branches of the Government of the United States. There is nothing contained there that the fathers and framers of the Constitution have not given either by direct grant or that does not spring from the direct grant by necessary implication.

I take no part or lot in the new doctrine of empire. The Constitution has given to the branches of the Government all the power necessary to govern a free and enlightened nation, and that is enough. Nobody has ever yet dreamed of inherent powers until the glitter of empire obscured our vision and blinded our judgment. This doctrine of inherent power in any one of the branches of government sprang from the desire of the advocates of this theory, to govern these dependencies and colonies other than according to the Constitution; and it can not be done. We have either got to govern them by the Constitution, or Congress must usurp power to govern them.

Mr. President, there is another part of the Constitution that seems to stretch proprio vigore over the Territories without any legislative action on the part of Congress. That is the provision that "duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States." Section 8 of Article I of the Constitution provides that—

> The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

There are two cases that I have examined with reference to this subject. The first is the case of Loughborough vs. Blake, and the second is the case of Cross vs. Harrison. The first case arose in the District of Columbia and the second in California. Chief Justice Marshall, in deciding the case of Loughborough vs. Blake (5 Wheaton, 643), used the following language:

The eighth section of the first article gives to Congress the "power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises," for the purposes thereinafter mentioned.

Senators will pardon me for reading this decision. I know they are all very familiar with it, for it has been quoted so many times that it has become almost a household word:

This grant is general, without limitation as to place. It consequently extends to all places over which the Government extends. If this could be doubted, the doubt is removed by the subsequent words which modify the grant. These words are, "but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States." It will not be contended that the modification of the power extends to places to which the power itself does not extend. The power, then, to lay and collect duties, imposts, and excises may be exercised and must be exercised throughout the United States. Does this term designate the whole or any particular portion of the American empire?

This learned judge uses the word "empire." He must have anticipated the acquisition of the Philippines—

Certainly this question can admit of but one answer. It is the name given to our great Republic, which is composed of States and Territories. The District of Columbia, or the territory west of the Missouri, is not less within the United States than Maryland or Pennsylvania; and it is not less necessary, on the principles of our Constitution, that uniformity in the imposition of imposts, duties, and excises should be observed in the one than in the other. Since, then, the power to lay and collect taxes, which includes direct taxes, is obviously coextensive with the power to lay and collect duties, imposts, and excises, and since the latter extends throughout the United States, it follows that the power to impose direct taxes also extends throughout the United States.

Notwithstanding this clear, unambiguous, and pertinent decision, an attempt is made to minimize its weight by the advocates of imperialism, on the ground that it is obiter.

Before I quote from Justice Wayne, in the case of Cross vs. Harrison (21 Howard, page 82), I will briefly state the facts of the case. The taxes, which had been paid under protest, were disputed by the plaintiff (Cross) upon the ground that the collector had no right to demand and receive them because there were no collection districts in California. There was a part of those taxes that was due under the de facto government of the Territory of California, and a part due after the ratification of the treaty of peace between the United States and Mexico. It appears that after the ratification, and before the notice of the ratification had been given to the collector in California, the taxes imposed by the military government were exacted, and after that period the revenue duties of the United States were exacted, and paid under protest. Justice Wayne, in deciding the case, said:

By the ratification of the treaty California became a part of the United States. And as there is nothing differently stipulated in the treaty with respect to commerce, it became instantly bound and privileged by the laws which Congress had passed to raise a revenue from duties on imports and tonnage.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will permit me, does not that language simply imply that there is power to stipulate in a treaty that might have some efficacy?

Mr. CAFFERY. That is a remote inference that might be drawn. Such things have been done, but I believe unconstitutionally done. I do not believe that a treaty can stipulate for any other duties than those that the United States imposes; that is, if they are different from the duties that are required to be paid under the revenue act, it would violate the uniformity of taxation.

Mr. SPOONER. Is not that where the Senator seems to differ from the Supreme Court?

Mr. CAFFERY. No, sir; I do not think so. The decision continues:

It has been sufficiently shown that the plaintiffs had no right to land their foreign goods in California at the times when their ships arrived with them, except by a compliance with the regulations which the civil government were authorised to enforce, first under a war tariff, and afterwards under the existing tariff act of the United States. By the last, foreign goods, as they are enumerated, are made dutiable; they are not so because they are brought into a collection district, but because they are imported into the United States. The tariff act of 1846 prescribes what that duty shall be. Can any reason be given for the exemption of foreign goods from duty because they have not been entered and collected at a port of delivery? The last become a part of the consumption of the country as well as the others. They may be carried from the point of landing into collection districts within which duties have been paid upon the same kind of goods; thus entering, by the retail sale of them, into competition with such goods and with our own manufactures and the products of our own farmers and planters. The right to land foreign goods within the United States at any place out of a collection district, if allowed, would be a violation of that provision in the Constitution which enjoins that all duties, imposts and excises, shall be uniform throughout the United States. Indeed it must be very clear that no such right exists, and that there was nothing in the condition of California to exempt importers of foreign goods into it from the payment of the same duties which were chargeable in the other ports of the United States. As to the denial of the authority of the President to prevent the landing of foreign goods in the United States out of a collection district, it can only be necessary to say, if he did not do so, it would be a neglect of his constitutional obligation "to take care that the laws be faithfully executed."

We will here briefly notice those objections which preceded that which has been discussed. The first of them, rather an assertion than an argument, that there was neither treaty nor law permitting the collection of duties, has been answered, it having been shown that the ratification of the treaty made California a part of the United States, and that as soon as it became so the territory became subject to the acts which were in force to regulate foreign commerce with the United States after those had ceased which had been instituted for its regulation as a belligerent right.

Mr. President, the first proposition of Judge Wayne in deciding this case is that California, by treaty, became a part of the United States. The next is that the tariff-revenue act of the United States then operating immediately attached to that Territory, and that the duties to be demanded and collected were those imposed by the revenue act, and in consequence of the principle of uniformity which must obtain in the imposition and collection of taxes throughout the United States.

These two decisions, in my opinion, ought to carry weight. They are not obiter; they are directly upon the point. They decide, first, that Territories are a part of the United States; then, that our tariff laws operate there by the principle of uniformity established in the Constitution. I can myself see no escape from these decisions. I can not see how it is possible to exact on imports from Puerto Rico into the United States any taxes whatever. One of the grounds of the formation of the Union was the embarrassment and difficulty arising on account of hostile tariff laws imposed in one State of the Confederacy against another.

It is obvious, Mr. President, that if our Constitution has any power whatever over the Territories this principle of uniformity of taxation must apply. There can be no duty levied upon the Philippine products imported into the United States, and there can be no export duty levied upon any exports from that country; otherwise you will establish another government; you will establish a different revenue system; you will have a government of colonies entirely distinct from the Government of the United States; you will have tariff duties laid according to the wisdom or unwisdom of Congress, at least according to its volition, operating in the colonies in a different way from that provided for the balance of the United States and without any regard to the Constitution. I do not see how this can be brought about.

The Constitution operates in this particular proprio vigore. The Constitution of the United States takes hold of the imports from these distant possessions and lays upon them the tariff duties that are charged everywhere over the United States, and none other. There can be none upon the imports into the United States from those countries and there can be no other upon imports from foreign countries into the Philippines than is exacted from the balance of the nations of the world. There must be an absolute uniformity, or this language of the Constitution is meaningless, or Congress has the unlimited powers which are claimed for it.

Mr. President, I have diverged somewhat from a discussion of the Constitution working of its own vigor in the matter of carrying these personal guaranties to the Territories into a discussion of the uniformity of taxation as applicable to the Territories, led into it to some extent by the question propounded to me.

There are a number of decisions on the matter of the right of the people of the Territories to have the constitutional guaranties of trial by jury applied to them. In the case of Callan vs. Wilson (120 U. S., page 547) the constitutional guaranty of trial by jury was applied to citizens of a Territory. The decision of the court, Justice Harlan delivering the opinion, is as follows:

It is contended by the appellant that the Constitution of the United States secured to him the right to be tried by a jury, and that, the right having been denied, the police court was without jurisdiction to impose a fine upon him, or order him to be imprisoned until such fine was paid. This precise question is now, for the first time, presented for determination by this court. * * *

The third article of the Constitution provides that "the trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury, and such trials shall be held in the State where the said crimes shall have been committed; but when not committed within any State, the trial shall be at such place or places as the Congress may by law have directed." The fifth amendment provides that no person shall "be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." By the sixth amendment it is declared that in "all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have previously been ascertained by law and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him, to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense." * * *

The contention of the Government is that the Constitution does not require that the right of trial by jury shall be secured to the people of the District of Columbia. * * *

Upon a careful examination of this position we are of opinion that it can not be sustained without violence to the letter and spirit of the Constitution. * * *

There is nothing in the history of the Constitution or of the original amendments to justify the assertion that the people of this District may be lawfully deprived of the benefit of any of the constitutional guaranties of life, liberty, and property, especially of the privilege of trial by jury in criminal cases. In the draft of a constitution reported by the committee of five on the 6th day of August, 1787, in the convention which framed the Constitution, the fourth section of Article XI read that "the trial of all criminal offenses (except in cases of impeachment) shall be in the States where they shall have been committed, and shall be by jury." (1 Elliott's Deb., 229.) But that article was, by unanimous vote, amended so as to read: "The trial of all crimes (except in cases of impeachment) shall be by jury; and such trial shall be held in the State where the said crime shall have been committed; but when not committed within any State, then the trial shall be at such place or places as the Legislature may direct." (Id., 270.) "The object of thus amending the section," says Mr. Madison, "was to provide for trial by jury of offenses committed out of any State." (3 Madison Papers, 144.) * * * We can not think that the people of this District have, in that regard, less rights than those accorded to the people of the Territories of the United States.

So in Springville vs. Thomas (166 U. S., page 708) the question was upon the unanimity of a verdict. The court, Mr. Chief Justice Fuller delivering the opinion, say:

In our opinion the seventh amendment secured unanimity in finding a verdict as an essential feature of trial by jury in common-law cases, and the act of Congress could not impart the power to change the constitutional rule, and could not be treated as attempting to do so.

The act of Congress was set aside as unconstitutional because it provided for a verdict that was rendered by a less number than twelve.

The case of Thompson vs. Utah (170 U. S., page 346) is to the same effect. The court, Mr. Justice Harlan delivering the opinion, say:

That the provisions of the Constitution of the United States relating to the right of trial by jury in suits at common law apply to the Territories of the United States is no longer an open question.

On page 350 the court say:

It must consequently be taken that the word jury and the words trial by jury were placed in the Constitution of the United States with reference to the meaning affixed to them in the law as it was in this country and in England at the time of the adoption of that instrument; and that when Thompson committed the offense of grand larceny in the Territory of Utah—which was under the complete jurisdiction of the United States for all purposes of government and legislation—the supreme law of the land required that he should be tried by a jury composed of not less than twelve persons.

I would not cite these opinions were it not that this unlimited power of Congress to dispense with the guaranties of the Constitution in the matter of jury trials had been urged in this Chamber. I believe the Senator from Vermont [Mr. ROSS] quoted a case in In re Ross which he thought established the fact that even in the matter of jury trials the Congress of the United States could set aside the guaranties in the amendments to the Constitution. The decision in In re Ross is found in 140 United States, and this is the opinion of the court:

By the Constitution a government is ordained and established "for the United States of America" and not for countries outside of their limits. The guaranties it affords against accusation of capital or infamous crimes, except by indictment or presentment by a grand jury, and for an impartial trial by a jury when thus accused, apply only to citizens and others within the United States, or who are brought there for trial for alleged offenses committed elsewhere, and not to residents or temporary sojourners abroad. (Cook vs. United States, 138 U. S., 157, 181.) The Constitution can have no operation in another country. When, therefore, the representatives or officers of our Government are permitted to exercise authority of any kind in another country, it must be on such conditions as the two countries may agree, the laws of neither one being obligatory upon the other. The deck of a private American vessel, it is true, is considered for many purposes constructively as territory of the United States, yet persons on board of such vessels, whether officers, sailors, or passengers, can not invoke the protection of the provisions referred to until brought within the actual territorial boundaries of the United States; and, besides, their enforcement abroad in numerous places where it would be highly important to have consuls invested with judicial authority would be impracticable from the impossibility of obtaining a competent grand or petit jury. The requirement of such a body to accuse and to try an offender would in a majority of cases cause an abandonment of all prosecution. The framers of the Constitution, who were fully aware of the necessity of having judicial authority exercised by our consuls in non-Christian countries, if commercial intercourse was to be had with their people, never could have supposed that all the guaranties in the administration of the law upon criminals at home were to be transferred to such consular establishments and applied before an American who had committed a felony there could be accused and tried.

What were the facts in this case? An American ship in a harbor in Japan had on board a seaman who was a British subject. He then and there committed the crime of murder within the territorial jurisdiction of Japan. He was arrested, tried, and condemned before a consular court established by treaty between the United States and Japan. He was condemned to death. He appealed to the President for a pardon. His sentence was commuted to life imprisonment. While in prison at Albany, N. Y., I believe, he sued out a writ of habeas corpus and the judge in rendering his decision, from which I have quoted, refused the habeas corpus.

Mr. President, does that establish the point sought to be established by the Senator from Vermont? Not only does it not establish the contention of the Senator from Vermont, but it directly refutes his contention; for it is asserted in this judgment, which is true, that the United States has no jurisdiction in foreign countries; that it is only by the comity of nations that it is allowed in these non-Christian countries to establish consular courts. This man could have been tried by the authorities of Japan, who primarily had jurisdiction. Notwithstanding the constructive extension of our territory over the ships that sail under our flag, the actual jurisdiction and the actual territory were in the foreign Government, and the United States only stipulated in behalf of its citizens for a fairer trial, one paying more respect to law and justice than would otherwise be obtained in such non-Christian courts.

But, says the judge, after the criminal is brought within our territories he is subject to trial according to the Constitution of the United States, and the Constitution of the United States guarantees to him the right of presentment by a grand jury, the right of trial by a petit jury, and a verdict of the whole jury in cases of felony. So this contention of the Senator from Vermont falls. This decision establishes precisely the reverse of unlimited power upon the part of Congress, and it does establish that any citizen of the United States coming within the Territorial jurisdiction of the United States is entitled to a trial by jury. Where, Mr. President, will these implied powers end, if a citizen of the United States can be jerked up and tried without a jury?

Mr. President, I had a quotation from Mr. Webster, whose great argument with Mr. Hayne almost broke down, if not quite broke down, the theory that the Constitution was the resultant of a compact between the sovereign States and not the resultant of the will of the people. As I can not now lay my hand on the quotation, I will read one from a contemporary of his who held precisely the opposite view about the Federal Constitution.

Mr. TELLER. The opposite view?

Mr. CAFFERY. Yes, in regard to the nature of Federal Constitution; one who was equally as emphatic as Mr. Webster. I refer to the great statesman of South Carolina, Mr. Calhoun. I quote from his speeches, page 411 of his works, volume 4:

That it would be contrary to the genius and character of our Government and subversive of our free popular institutions to hold Mexico as a subject province is a proposition too clear for argument before a body so enlightened as the Senate. You know the American Constitution too well—you have looked into history, and are too well acquainted with the fatal effects which large provincial possessions have ever had on the institutions of free states—to need any proof to satisfy you how hostile it would be to the institutions of this country to hold Mexico as a subject province. There is not an example on record of any free state holding a province of the same extent and population without disastrous consequences. The nations conquered and held as a province have, in time, retaliated by destroying the liberty of their conquerors through the corrupting effect of extended patronage and irresponsible power. Such, certainly, would be our case. The conquest of Mexico would add so vastly to the patronage of this Government that it would absorb the whole powers of the State; the Union would become an imperial power, and the States reduced to mere subordinate corporations. But the evil would not end there; the process would go on, and the power transferred from the States to the Union would be transferred from the legislative department to the Executive. All the immense patronage which holding it as a province would create—the maintenance of a large army to hold it in subjection and the appointment of a multitude of civil officers necessary to govern it—would be vested in him. The great influence which it would give the President would be the means of controlling the legislative department and subjecting it to his dictation, especially when combined with the principle of proscription which has now become the established practice of the Government. The struggle to obtain the Presidential chair would become proportionably great—so great as to destroy the freedom of elections. The end would be anarchy or despotism, as certain as I am now addressing the Senate.

I believe those words are prophetic. I believe that the end of empire is destruction. I believe when the Constitution of the United States is wrenched from its moorings and carried into these remote seas and is established there in despotic sway, that it is the beginning of the end of the Republic. All these evils spoken of by Mr. Calhoun would necessarily flow, all the vast patronage which proconsular appointments to those distant possessions would give, all the innumerable jobs which would spring from such possessions, would necessarily corrupt the people at home just as the proconsuls of Rome corrupted the Roman citizens and destroyed that great Republic.

Mr. President, we have heard a great deal about Congressional power. We have heard a great deal about the limitation of our Constitution to our present dimensions. It has been stoutly denied that the Constitution extends over our new territories. It has been stoutly denied that any of these people whom we take in are people of the United States, and all this in line with the imperial policy of the present. The Declaration of Independence has been set aside as a worn-out garment. It is one of these parochial questions spoken of by a distinguished member of the Cabinet which ought not to claim our attention at all, but we ought to set our eyes upon those heights where glory-crowned American freedom sits. Where that is I am not now able to say. We are invited to go upon a voyage to Cathay and explore all the riches of the ancient Empire of China; and in order to do this we must set up an imperial sway in the Philippine Islands.

I believe that it is not inopportune to discuss the principle of governments being founded on the consent of the governed. I do not believe the Declaration of Independence is a dead letter. I do not believe that it has no connection at all with the present policies of the Government. I do not believe that it can be set aside. I believe that it is part and parcel of the Constitution of the United States. This great nationality contended for by the Senator from Connecticut I concede, but, sir, the American nation sprung into existence before the American nation ordained the Constitution of the United States. The people who framed the Constitution of the United States, acting by their delegates to the Constitutional Convention, were the same people who announced as the living principle of American liberty that all governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. And who were they? They were the people of the United States of America, and the delegates to the Continental Congress spoke in behalf of that people.

When that Declaration was sent abroad as a principle of government it was sent by and with the authority of the American people. It was as much the voice of a nation as the voice that proclaimed the Constitution of the United States. Nationality then came into birth. That same nationality, however it might have been scattered and dissipated throughout the 13 original colonies, existed throughout the war of independence; and when the war was over, the same people who framed the Declaration of Independence framed the Constitution of the United States, and there has never yet been a statesman of any merit or distinction in the United States who has ever held that the people of the United States were not the ultimate foundation of all sovereignty, that the people of the United States themselves did not constitute sovereignty. And who are the people of the United States, Mr. President? For whom was the Constitution of the United States framed? Was it framed entirely for the people then living and the heirs of their body? When the representatives of the people sent forth the Constitution of the United States, they declared that they ordained and established that Constitution for themselves and their posterity in order that they might enjoy the blessings of peace and liberty.

And who, Mr. President, are the posterity of the framers of the Constitution? The Constitution provides for naturalizing foreigners. Will anyone say that the 10,000,000 Germans in the United States are not our "posterity" in the sense that word is used in the Constitution of the United States. Have they not been "adopted" by naturalization? Will anyone deny that any human being taken within the jurisdiction of the United States is the posterity spoken of by the framers of the Constitution? When the population of the province of Louisiana were taken in by adoption they became heirs to all the privileges and immunities and rights granted by the Constitution of the United States to freemen coming within the operation of its provisions and coming under the jurisdiction of its flag.

Mr. President, I am not entirely without support in the contention I make that the Declaration of Independence is a part and parcel of our organic law. Sir, that Declaration stated the foundation of government. It stated that all governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. That is the living, energizing principle of the Declaration of Independence, and that is incorporated as a part of the Constitution of the United States. In pursuance of that Declaration the Constitution of the United States was framed so as to give representative government, and so that the consent of the governed could be had in an unmistakable form.

In this connection I will state that it does not make any difference whether the consent of the governed is expressed in one form or another. Any government of civilized people which is tolerated by that people, which is acquiesced in by that people, is presumably the government of their consent. Would anyone say the constitutional monarchy of Germany is not a government founded upon the consent of the governed? I think not. Would anyone hold that the voluntary obedience of a half-civilized people to their rulers, that their acquiescence in a government for ages, for instance, the ancient Empire of China, is not a government founded on the consent of the people? I think not. But in order to give the consent of the people an active form, the Constitution of the United States, modeled and grounded upon the Declaration of Independence, provided for a representative form of government. I quote from Pomeroy on Constitutional Law, page 36, section 52:

> Again, the Declaration of Independence was not the work of thirteen separate colonies, each acting in an assumed sovereign capacity, but of the united colonies, acting in a national capacity, through their delegates in Congress assembled. This Congress did not propose the Declaration to the States and recommend its adoption by their local legislatures; nor did it need such indorsement to give it validity. State ratification, when made, was a work of supererogation. The Declaration was finally and forever established by the whole independent political society, through the means which they had appointed. The language of the instrument itself indicates its nature and its origin. Nothing is said of the independence of the several States, but the operative clauses indissolubly combine the idea of organic unity and nationality with that of independence. "We, therefore, the representatives of the United States of America, in general Congress assembled, appealing to the Supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of our intentions, do, in the name and by the authority of the good people of these colonies, solemnly publish and declare, that these united colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States—
> This Declaration is made by and in the name of the good people of the colonies, declaring their independence of the British Crown—
>
> "that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British Crown, and that all political connection between them and the State of Great Britain is, and ought to be, totally dissolved."
>
> There never was, in fact, a moment's interval when the several States were each independent and sovereign. While colonies they unitedly resisted, revolted, declared that combined political society independent. The blow which severed the connection with the British Empire did not leave a disintegrated mass made up of thirteen communities, now independent; it left a united mass, a political unity, a nation possessing the high attributes of sovereignty, which it had just exercised. The United States was then a fact, and no power but that which called it into being—the people—is competent to decree the national destruction.

Here is the opinion of a very distinguished constitutional author who can not be accused of any desire to limit any of the powers of the Federal Government—that is manifest from an examination of his writings—who declares that the Declaration of Independence was the act of a political unit, the people of the colonies in their sovereign national capacity, and that Declaration has as much strength and bearing as if it were incorporated as an article of the Constitution of the United States, for that Constitution is framed upon this Declaration. The Constitution only carries into execution the general principles of government announced in the Declaration of Independence.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator carry his contention under the Declaration of Independence to the extent of asserting that the United States has no constitutional power at the end of a war with a foreign government, and in settlement of it, to exact and to accept inhabited territory as a ceded conquest without the consent of its inhabitants? Does the Senator apply the doctrine for which he is contending to such a case as that?

Mr. CAFFERY. I do. I contend, in answer to the question of the Senator from Wisconsin, that we can wage no war of conquest. I contend that every line and word of the Constitution of the United States only authorizes us to make war for the common defense.

Mr. SPOONER. Then the Senator contends that the acquisition of California from Mexico at the end of the Mexican war was unconstitutional.

Mr. CAFFERY. I do not.

Mr. SPOONER. Then the Senator admits that we may take at the end of a war, justifiable in its inauguration and conduct, inhabited territory as indemnity, accompanied by cession, without the consent?

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, that depends upon the nature and character of the territory and its inhabitants, and its inhabitants especially. If there is a people, if there is a nationality, if there is the germ of nationality, you must procure the consent of that people or you violate the fundamental principles of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. SPOONER. Then, if the Senator will permit me, his contention is that we have no constitutional power at the end of a war between ourselves and another government to accept by way of indemnity and take a cession of the territory of another government, or another nation, not a party to the war. That I agree to.

Mr. CAFFERY. I did not contend that we could not take by agreement the territory of another nation not at war. I said we could not take the territory of a nation with whom we were at war if that territory were inhabited by a people with the germ of nationality and with a capacity to give national consent.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh!

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, I see——

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator will permit me. Do not almost every people have the germ of nationality?

Mr. CAFFERY. No, sir. A wandering, nomadic tribe has no nationality. A scattered, roving band of Indians have no nationality or any step or progress toward nationality.

Mr. SPOONER. I said the germ of nationality. That is what the Senator from Louisiana said.

Mr. CAFFERY. They have not the germ of nationality. They have no starting point and they end nowhere.

But, sir, under the Constitution of the United States, in my opinion, the Declaration of Independence forming a part and parcel of that august instrument, you can not take any people who have the capacity to form a government and have the germs of nationality into the territory of the United States without their consent. You can not take the Canadians without their consent. If a war was waged against Great Britain and the United States triumphed, as everybody knows she would triumph, and Canada was sought to be taken by the United States to indemnify the United States for the expenses incurred in that war, I do not believe, without a violation of our organic instrument, without a violation of our traditions of government, without a violation of that Declaration made on the 4th of July, 1776, that you could take those people and force upon them the Government of the United States without their will or consent.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. CAFFERY. That is the position that I assume.

Mr. SPOONER. Why? Will the Senator say why not?

Mr. TELLER. Give us a reason.

Mr. CAFFERY. Why not?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. CAFFERY. Because it is repugnant not only to the genius and the spirit of our Constitution, but it is repugnant to the very letter of that document, which, though not contemporaneous, is linked in with the Constitution and becomes a part of the Constitution, and is the corner stone of the Constitution which you have adopted in every ordinance that you have made, which pervades the American mind, which is a part of their political rights and political heritage, and which when it departs liberty will depart and free government depart. That is what I believe. I believe that our ancestors in that Declaration of Independence did more than to announce a principle of government for themselves directly; they announced it for the world, and the world has profited by it.

I believe in no war of aggression. I do not believe you can absorb any people who are a people against their will and consent; and I believe, from the facts as detailed by our own officers and observant travelers, that the Filipinos are such a nation and have the germs of a national life, and that we can not, without violation of our Constitution itself, kill them to civilize them, slaughter them to give them liberty. That is what I do not believe you can do.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator from Louisiana permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator said, in answer to the questions of the Senator from Wisconsin, that it all depended upon whether or not these people had the germ of nationality or were in reality a people.

Mr. CAFFERY. Yes, sir.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Who is to determine whether they have the germ or not?

Mr. CAFFERY. That is largely to be determined by the conscience and the judgment of both parties. We can not assume to deny a nationality that exists as a matter of fact. Suppose we had taken Spain. From all accounts the Filipino government is quite as good as that of Spain. The Filipino had almost as much liberty as the individual Spaniard. Now, suppose that instead of taking the Philippines we had chosen to take the Kingdom of Spain as indemnity, could we assume to say that they did not have a national life?

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Louisiana permit me? Suppose we had chosen, after a long and expensive war with Spain, to take a portion of the Spanish domain as indemnity, would we have been obliged to have asked and obtained the consent of the inhabitants of that portion?

Mr. CAFFERY. I think so.

Mr. SPOONER. And if they did not consent, would we be precluded from any indemnity by way of territory?

Mr. CAFFERY. I think so, sir. If they are a part of that nationality, you can not segregate them. You could not destroy the nationality piecemeal. You could not take part of Barcelona or Cadiz, a part of Castile and a little part of Andalusia, and leave the Spaniards confined to the middle of the territory.

Mr. SPOONER. Did we not destroy the nationality of Mexico piecemeal when we took a part of Mexican territory and its inhabitants?

Mr. CAFFERY. I think not.

Mr. SPOONER. We did not?

Mr. CAFFERY. No.

Mr. TELLER. Why not?

Mr. SPOONER. Then the Senator would say we would have had no power to take Puerto Rico as indemnity if any of the Puerto Ricans had objected?

Mr. CAFFERY. I am not aware that the Puerto Ricans had national life.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh!

Mr. CAFFERY. I do not know whether they had or not. I rather think they had. I think they had more than the Cubans.

Mr. SPOONER. Then the germ of nationality is a little difficult to define?

Mr. CAFFERY. Well, it is. I admit that. Every case depends on its own circumstances.

Mr. SPOONER. I only want to get at the Senator's views. Does he say that we would have had no power to exact as indemnity at the end of the war Puerto Rico if it had not been entirely agreeable to its people?

Mr. CAFFERY. In this particular war we had no right to exact any indemnity from anybody.

Mr. SPOONER. But leave that out. On general principles?

Mr. CAFFERY. On general principles I would state that I do not think we would have the right.

Mr. SPOONER. Then the Senator would say that the United States, unlike any other nation in the world, is precluded by the Declaration of Independence from accepting or exacting at the end of a war as indemnity inhabited territory unless it is inhabited by nomadic tribes without a germ?

Mr. CAFFERY. Well.

Mr. SPOONER. That is, people who never could become, under any circumstances, a nationality.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, I would drop them like I would a hot potato if they had the germ of imperialism, whatever sort of nationality they had. I think that is one of these microbes that eats its poisonous way into the vitals of republics. But this is a cross-examination, Mr. President. Of course I am only laying down the general principles.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. CAFFERY. I do not object, as a matter of course.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Louisiana a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator seems to think if there is an organized society, then it must be consulted.

Mr. CAFFERY. I do.

Mr. TELLER. Was there not an organized society in Louisiana?

Mr. CAFFERY. No, sir.

Mr. TELLER. You say there was not?

Mr. CAFFERY. No, sir.

Mr. TELLER. Then I will put the question as to other sections that I think you will have to admit, although I could challenge your statement that there was not an organized society there. They had a government.

Mr. CAFFERY. That is a difference of opinion about a matter of fact. I do not think there was.

Mr. TELLER. Take the province of California, which was a political organization and had been for many years. The same was true of New Mexico. Both of them had governments and all the appliances of civilized governments, of course, under the general power of Mexico. Now, was it necessary to consult them?

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, it was not.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator tell us why?

Mr. CAFFERY. Because they had nothing but a municipal life. They had no national life.

Mr. TELLER. But they were a part of a national life.

Mr. CAFFERY. The territory was so vast, the population was so scattered, that it was impossible in that particular instance that there should have been either an incipient or a complete national life. Now, then, if we do, under the stress of circumstances, take territory inhabited by a sparse population, and that population has no capacity to give or to withhold a national consent, I do not see any objection to taking them within our territory. Now, in the case of Louisiana——

Mr. SPOONER. Then, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. CAFFERY. Permit me to state. Just pardon me for a moment.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. CAFFERY. My friend from Colorado has stated that he thinks that there was a national life there. Now, in that whole territory, running from almost the Canadian border to the Gulf and west of the Mississippi River to the territories of Spain and California, the whole number of inhabitants, according to the census report taken by a United States collector of customs, I think, in 1803, amounted to but 49,000 people.

Mr. TELLER. That is quite right.

Mr. CAFFERY. There were about 8,000 of that population in the city of New Orleans. The parishes—they were then called parishes, for the subdivisions of my State instead of being called counties are called parishes—were very thinly settled. All of that territory, 1,800,000 square miles of territory, larger in area than the whole of the Northwest Territory with the original thirteen States, was only inhabited, black and white, by 49,000 people.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator permit me? They were not nomadic tribes, were they?

Mr. CAFFERY. They were not exactly nomadic, but they were mostly pioneers, adventurers. The mass of the population was congested in the city of New Orleans. But here was this immense territory, big enough for an empire. You can not say there was a national life or any approach to a national life in that territory.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator mean to say that pioneers have no right to come in under the Declaration?

Mr. CAFFERY. No; I do not mean any such thing. Pioneers have as much national life as anybody, if they get together into an organized society, as a matter of course.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator mean to say that 49,000 people have not as much right to consent and to govern under the Declaration?

Mr. CAFFERY. I do not say any such thing. I say that the 49,000 people, inhabiting an area of 1,800,000 square miles, was a population practically so small in comparison to the area, having nothing but a municipal government under the authority of Spain, they had no national life and could not have any national life.

Mr. SPOONER. That depends not only on the number of people, but upon the size of the territory?

Mr. CAFFERY. It does not, sir. If there are 49,000 people in any little republic on God's earth or any little empire or kingdom that has an organized government, that have their courts, their system of government, that society is protected against American aggression under the Declaration of Independence.

But that sort of a society is by no means paralleled by the condition of Louisiana. Here was a vast territory, most of it uninhabited. I believe that that territory was properly acquired, and any other territory under the same conditions would be properly acquired.

Mr. TELLER. So do we. We believe that.

Mr. CAFFERY. And I believe the mass of the people there, if a vote had been taken, would have voted to come into the United States; all, perhaps, except the French residents of the city of New Orleans.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Now, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The Senator is very kind in yielding. But suppose Mexico makes war upon us, and we carry the war into Mexico and conquer Mexico?

Mr. CAFFERY. Yes.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Have we got to consult the people there as to what we will do?

Mr. CAFFERY. Yes, sir. You can not wage any war of aggression. It is not only ingrafted into our political framework of government, but there is the authority of the United States Supreme Court maintaining that position, the case of Fleming vs. Page, and also in a case in which Mr. Justice Clifford rendered the opinion of the court.

But the genius and character of our institutions are peaceful, and the power to declare war was not conferred upon Congress for the purpose of aggression or aggrandizement, but to enable the General Government to vindicate by arms, if it should become necessary, its own rights and the rights of its citizens.

A war, therefore, declared by Congress can never be presumed to be waged for the purpose of conquest or the acquisition of territory; nor does the law declaring the war imply an authority to the President to enlarge the limits of the United States by subjugating the enemy's country. The United States, it is true, may extend its boundaries by conquest or treaty, and may demand the cession of territory as the condition of peace in order to indemnify its citizens for the injuries they have suffered or to reimburse the Government for the expenses of the war. But this can be done only by the treaty-making power or the legislative authority, and is not a part of the power conferred upon the President by the declaration of war. As Commander in Chief he is authorized to direct the movements of the naval and military forces placed by law at his command and employ them in the manner he may deem most effectual to harass and conquer and subdue the enemy. He may invade the hostile country and subject it to the sovereignty and authority of the United States. But his conquests do not enlarge the boundaries of this Union nor extend the operation of our institution and laws beyond the limits before assigned to them by the legislative power.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator from Louisiana permit me a question?

Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator said in answer to the question of the Senator from Wisconsin that the whole thing depends upon whether the individuals have a germ of nationality, and in answer to my question the Senator said that whether they had this germ of nationality would have to be determined by consulting the conscience of both parties.

Mr. CAFFERY. I think so.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Now, passing over the rather pertinent query as to how you would find out what the conscience of both parties answered, suppose that the conscience of one party answered one thing and the conscience of another party answered the other thing, then where are you? Are you not simply at the point where you are going to do just what the conscience of the party that is the stronger says? Is not that where the Senator's argument ends?

Mr. CAFFERY. No, sir. My arguments never end in force. It is the argument of force, Mr. President, that has been pushed forward before the Senate to vindicate the action of the United States in taking the Philippine Islands.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield?

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Then the Senator, if he will pardon me for saying it, did not answer the question put by the Senator from Connecticut. The Senator from Connecticut——

Mr. CAFFERY. The Senator from Connecticut is perfectly quiescent. He has not complained, and the Senator from Wisconsin is not his brother's keeper in this regard.

Mr. SPOONER. No, sir; but I am seeking for information, and I value the Senator's views.

Mr. CAFFERY. I am much obliged to the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. I regard him as a very able lawyer; I have never known a man anywhere who had stronger convictions or exhibited more moral courage in adhering to them than the Senator, and I should be very sorry if he considered any interruption by me as other than respectful.

Mr. CAFFERY. I beg pardon of the Senator; I do not think so at all. It is only a little bit of pleasantry. I am much obliged to the Senator for his highly complimentary phrases.

Mr. SPOONER. Well, they are sincere. The question which the Senator from Connecticut put to the Senator from Louisiana was this: Whether if Mexico should wage war upon us in the prosecution of a war originating in self-defense, which oftentimes and nearly always involves aggression, that course were pursued, and we should insist upon a part of Mexico, whether we would be obliged to consult the inhabitants?

Mr. CAFFERY. I will answer that question precisely as I answered the Senator from Connecticut. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. If we took it as indemnity?

Mr. CAFFERY. We can not take it as indemnity against the consent of the Mexicans. I answered that question distinctly.

Mr. SPOONER. Then, what is there left to the United States?

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, we have an empire left. We covet no other portion of God's earth than that we possess. Republics have been weakened by these extensive dominions stretching abroad in every direction. Our strength lies in maintaining our institutions at home. Our strength lies in developing our own resources. Our strength did not come from distant foreign acquisition, and it never will come from such acquisitions. Weakness rather, Mr. President, comes from extensive and distant foreign dominions. We have an instance of it right now. The greatest power of the earth is trembling to her very center in a war waged against less than a million of freemen in the Transvaal; and if England's weakness is ever demonstrated to the world it will be through her extensive dominions abroad. She trembles to-day at the specter of the Russian Bear crawling over the Ural Mountains, and well she may tremble at the result of the contest in the Transvaal.

There the whole power of that mighty empire is unable to subdue 1,000,000 people, and half of them black. There is no strength in these extended dominions. There was no strength in them to the Roman Empire. Her downfall was precipitate, sudden, and crushing when she went beyond the seas, the Adriatic, the Mediterranean, and the Atlantic, to subdue the nations of the earth. The very moment you take in such people as the Mexicans and the Filipinos and these unassimilative nations, that very moment you have inoculated our own Republic with a poison which will circulate through every vein in its political body.

I do not believe that there is any warrant, any constitutional warrant anywhere, to take foreign territory as an indemnity or any other way against the consent of the people from whom you take it, if they are in a position to give a national consent; and at that doctrine I do not halt, whether it is a little republic or whether it is a vast empire.

Now, Mr. President, look at the condition of the world to-day. Germany, France, England, and Russia are all greedy and voracious, ready to gobble up the Chinese Empire and partition it out among them as a piece of personal property. The Declaration of Independence says to us, "Beware, beware of such acquisitions of territory." Not only I do not believe that the acquisition of foreign territory and an unassimilative people against their consent is weakness, but I believe it is an outrage and a crime. I believe it was weak and atrocious to take these people in the Philippine Islands who are fighting for their independence and, under the Pecksniffian garb of humanity, to murder and butcher them in order that they might enjoy the benefits of American liberty.

Now, Mr. President, my amiable friends have diverted me a good deal. I want to say that there is warrant in the Constitution of the United States to justify the position I assume—that every particle of territory that we take in the United States, whether unduly or not, becomes a part and parcel of the United States; that the whole Constitution, not only the Bill of Rights, but the whole Constitution, proprio vigore, extends to that kind of acquisition. The Constitution declares that—

This Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof and all treaties made or which shall be made under the authority of the United States shall be the supreme law of the land.

Of what land? Of any land, all lands, every possession over which the jurisdiction of the United States extends. You can not limit that phrase at any one time to certain boundaries. If the Constitution is supreme over all the land, how are you going to circumscribe the land which you yourself have brought within the jurisdiction of the Constitution. Whether ex invito, whether by their free will and consent or not, the Constitution, proprio vigore, works there.

Why, sir, the pretension is made here that Congress not only have power to rule despotically, but they have power to create a new form of government, founded on a new principle. The deduction of my friend from Connecticut, for whom I have the greatest respect, that because the nation is supreme therefore Congress is supreme is to my mind a monstrous deduction, not warranted by the premises, one repugnant to every line and letter of the Constitution and to the spirit that breathes through that whole instrument.

Mr. President, the power given to Congress to make all needful rules and regulations for the government of the Territories is nothing but a grant of an administrative power. Can Congress make any and every rule and regulation it deems wise and proper? No, sir.

Mr. SPOONER. What does it mean, then, if the Senator will permit me, by saying "all needful rules and regulations?"

Mr. CAFFERY. It means just what it says. It means that the Congress of the United States can only administer these Territories under and by virtue of the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, and it means nothing else. But the meaning of the imperialists is that side by side with this Republic you erect an empire. Taking this Republic as a foundation, you erect on its base a superstructure of tyranny and despotism. That is the principle; that is your argument—govern at will; govern unlimitedly; we have the inherent power; there is nothing to restrain us; the Constitution has given it to us. I deny that proposition. You can not infer absolutism from a grant of administration. That grant must be confined to the purpose for which it was given, and that purpose is to govern these Territories under the provisions of the Constitution, and no other purpose.

I will not say anything, Mr. President, in regard to the constitutional purpose for which we can take territory. Notwithstanding the decision in the Dred Scott case is belittled and derided, that part of the decision which says that the only constitutional purpose for which we can acquire territory is to make new States has never been controverted, and can not be successfully controverted.

The opinion of Mr. Webster and Mr. Calhoun and I believe the opinion of every distinguished man of their period was that there was no power in the Constitution of the United States for Congress to take and to hold as subject colonies the territories acquired by the United States.

What do you do if you carry out the doctrine of the brilliant junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE]? You make a new kind of government; you establish a tyranny, a despotism, in the Philippine Islands; you hold them perpetually in sway; you establish a proconsular government. It is a delightful piece of information to be told that our foreign governors will be highly gifted men, so much so that their government will have a beneficial, reflex action upon us at home. It is very delightful to be told that; but I had rather confine myself as to the consequences of that sort of government to the experience of all past ages, to the experience of all republics, proving that sort of government was absolutely destructive of the republic which undertook it.

You can not create a government by implication. Is it not wonderful, sir, that the framers of the Constitution of the United States should have undertaken to guard so sedulously, so carefully, the liberties of the people against our own governors here at home, our own functionaries right here, where a vigilant people and an enlightened press could take note of every departure from the principles of liberty, and should have given Congress the power to establish in distant lands beyond the sea an empire beyond control of the people, without any of the safeguards that our fathers provided for the security of our liberties?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CAFFERY. Yes, sir.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Will the Senator from Louisiana tell the Senate what he means by our establishing an empire in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. CAFFERY. I mean this, Mr. President: I mean that the power is contended for that Congress can establish in the Philippine Islands, or in any other territory that we may acquire, just such a government as Congress pleases, and that that government shall be made permanent if Congress shall please. That is what I call an empire. That is what I call despotism. That is what I call a government created by Congressional action without the warrant of the Constitution.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question, as he has very kindly yielded to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator was speaking about safeguards. How would the establishment of such a government as that take away or affect any of the safeguards with which the Senator says we are surrounded here?

Mr. CAFFERY. It is very easy—conceding all the power of appointment to rest with the President of the United States. The United States Constitution would be ignored in the government of such a territory. The President could appoint one man as governor, one as captain-general, another as judge; and the whole government, in fact, would lodge in the hands of the President of the United States. That government is not a government consistent with the Constitution of the United States. That is the government of Spain.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Does not that system substantially now apply in all the Territories of the United States?

Mr. CAFFERY. Ah, Mr. President, that is simply in the tutelage of those Territories; that is not a permanency.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It has been.

Mr. CAFFERY. When the President of the United States appoints the governor of a Territory, he appoints that governor as the initial step toward statehood. He does not appoint that governor to continue during life, another governor to follow him, and another governor to follow him, down to the last syllable of recorded time. Your permanent plan establishes empire. You have assumed greater power than the German Kaiser exercises. He has no such power in Germany, and there is not a despotism in Europe—there are very few now there—there is not a government of Europe that would leave such unlimited power in the hands of the President as that contended for by the gentlemen who advocate the policy of imperialism. Govern those people perpetually, permanently, without representation, without any voice in the Government—if that is not despotism, Mr. President, I should like to know what despotism is; if that is not tyranny under the American view, I should like to know what tyranny is.

The truth is, if the Senator from Indiana is to be taken as an authority on that point, we had no business ever to take those islands. If those people are incapable of self-government, as he says they are, then you have ingrafted perpetually upon the American Government a foreign growth, to be controlled, necessarily, by some central despotic power here; and that, I say, is repugnant not only to the letter, but to the spirit of our Constitution.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CAFFERY. Yes, sir.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I understand the Senator to say that if those people are incapable of self-government, then it is necessary that they should be governed by a central and, as he says, despotic power?

Mr. CAFFERY. Yes, sir; but let that central and despotic power be one established by themselves, if they want it; let us keep our hands off of all despotism, and let some other hands enjoy the beneficent pleasure of ruling a subject people.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. Does the Senator from Louisiana contend that the Constitution of the United States is in force in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. CAFFERY. The military arm of the Constitution is in force; not the peaceful arm of it.

Mr. TELLER. But I want to know whether the Constitution is there irrespective of any restriction?

Mr. CAFFERY. It is there constructively; it is not there actually; and you do not propose to put it there actually.

Mr. TELLER. But how can we put it there actually? That is the question.

Mr. CAFFERY. Well, Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado knows just as well as I do that the Filipinos and we have been waging war against each other ever since last February, just a year ago, and that it has been impossible for us to have an actual possession of that territory. I do not see any point in stating whether the Constitution is actually there or not in view of the military operations going on in that territory.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I desire now to ask the Senator a question, for which I have previously obtained his consent.

Mr. CAFFERY. Very well.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I assume two things: First, that we are in possession of the Philippine Islands and have a legal title there; second, that the people there are not capable of self-government. What, under those circumstances, shall we do? Shall we get out, or shall we try to bring them up to a condition where they will be capable of self-government?

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, I would say to the Senator from Connecticut, turn them loose as soon as you can do so. That is just my idea about it.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Does the Senator think that would be better for those people?

Mr. CAFFERY. It would be better for us.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Or is it better to try to bring them up to the enjoyment of the blessings and the privileges of free government?

Mr. CAFFERY. It would be better for us to turn them loose as soon as we could, considering all the circumstances.

Mr. MONEY. If the Senator will allow me, would it not be a great deal better for us, whether it would be better for the Filipinos or not?

Mr. CAFFERY. It would be better for us; and what would be better for us would be better for them.

Mr. President, we have heard a great deal of the humanitarian idea of subduing people to civilize them, of killing them to Christianize them, of murdering them to give them the benefit of good government. I should like to know, Mr. President, what is the condition of the provinces of England? I should like to know whether all history does not teach us that no people have ever wrought out civilization except of themselves, through themselves, and by their own efforts?

There was a time in the history of the world when these dark races, whom we are now oppressing in the Tropics, had more of civilization and enlightenment than the Aryan race, which is now oppressing them. The Mongolian races in China had a civilization antedating ours. There was a time when our ancestors were roving in the forests hunting, pursuing a nomadic life, when these peoples were partially civilized and enjoying the blessings of government.

In this transition of human affairs we now have arrived at the highest degree of excellence in civilization that the world ever saw. But does that civilization give us any charter to impose upon people with fire and sword our particular civilization, our particular views of government? No, sir. If we will continue in the plan that we have heretofore adopted of disseminating the principles of our free government in peaceful methods, we may and will, I believe, in God's providence, live to see a plentiful harvest reaped from the seed of liberty we sow abroad. I believe that by peaceful methods we can instill our principle of government into half-civilized and semibarbaric peoples better than by the Mohammedan principle of fire and sword.

There is not a nation of the world to-day that holds subject peoples—Great Britain particularly—that does not feel the danger, the calamity, of insurrection among her subject tribes and the dismemberment of empire in consequence. The people of India are sullen and discontented. They have not forgotten that the Sepoys were shot at the mouth of the cannon in the great mutiny of the fifties; and, sir, when they are civilized up to that point that the English propose to civilize them according to their not very sincere humanitarian declarations, that will be the signal of the independence of the Hindoos and the absolving of any allegiance that they may have to the British Crown. What good are those people to her?

This thing of commercial greed, this thing of seeking foreign markets in semibarbaric countries is no justification for the aggressive war we are waging against the Filipinos. The game is not worth the candle. The trade statistics show that civilized nations deal mostly with civilized nations, and that the vast mass of our exports are to-day to civilized and not to savage peoples—more than nine-tenths of them. All this glittering, showy panorama of empire and riches amounts to nothing. It is an empty bauble; it is something that perhaps may enrich a few promoters and a few exploiters, but it will not benefit the mass of the American people; it never will benefit them, because that country is not capable of settlement by any white race.

Notwithstanding the statement of the Senator from Indiana of the healing seas, of the delightful breezes, of the fertile soil, of the excellent health enjoyed by the people there, the fact remains that there are not in the Philippine Islands 10,000 Spaniards, after three hundred years of occupation by them. There is no place on the globe where the white race has ever flourished in the Tropics or in the sub-Tropics; and if the prize is held out to the American yeoman that that distant country will afford him a home, will afford an opportunity for him to work up, as our ancestors did, from the wilderness into flourishing States and cities, that promise is vain. It is a promise that will bring nothing but disappointment; and if we expect any addition to our strength by a great increase of our trade from the acquisition of the Philippine Islands, we shall be a very much disappointed people.

I believe it was the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], or perhaps it was the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], who asked me what I would do with those people. Mr. President, I have thought but little on that point. I think that the great error was committed when we ratified the treaty of peace. I think that was the beginning of our woes, and I think the quicker we can get rid of the complications and embarrassments attendant upon the ratification of that treaty the better it will be for the American Republic.

Mr. STEWART. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. CAFFERY. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEWART. Would the Senator vote for the passage of a law at this time to dispose of those islands—to give them away, to give those people their independence to get rid of them? Would the Senator withdraw our Army there now and let the islands go?

Mr. CAFFERY. I do not think now is the proper time for that.

Mr. STEWART. When will the proper time be?

Mr. CAFFERY. As soon as we have restored the status quo.

Mr. STEWART. Then the Senator——

Mr. CAFFERY. Permit me to answer your question. As soon as we have restored the condition of affairs to such an extent that those people can be assured of their independence, I believe that the same declaration that we made in regard to Cuba ought to be applied to the Philippine Islands. I believe from the facts I have read that those people are much more capable of self-government than are the Cubans. I believe those people have every muniment and had every muniment of a republic when the cooperation of Aguinaldo was used, if not invited, to crush the Spanish army.

Mr. STEWART. Is the Senator from Louisiana dissatisfied with what is being done now?

Mr. CAFFERY. I am.

Mr. STEWART. Is the Senator dissatisfied with what is being done and what has been done for the last month? Is there anything which has been done since Congress convened of which the Senator disapproves?

Mr. CAFFERY. The Filipinos are in scattered bands, in insurrectionary bands, and we insist upon imposing our Government upon them at the point of the bayonet. That is all. We continue to do just what we started out to do.

Mr. STEWART. Would the Senator stop the war right now?

Mr. CAFFERY. I would call for an armistice; I would promise the Filipinos independence; and there never would be a gun fired afterwards. You can give these people peace the very moment you declare peaceful intentions, the very moment you declare your intention not to absorb them permanently and not to govern them despotically. Then you will not use any weapons; you will have no need to use weapons, but peace can be had by peaceful declarations. As I said, however, it is idle to talk about peace when both sides have arms in their hands and both sides are fighting.

Mr. STEWART. Then your idea is that the soldiers of the United States should lay down their arms?

Mr. CAFFERY. I have explained my ideas sufficiently, and there is no use catechising me upon such quibbling points. That is perfectly idle. My proposition is perfectly plain.

Mr. STEWART. Not to me.

Mr. CAFFERY. Well, then, I can not give the Senator comprehension of my bad points.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator a question, if it will not be out of the way.

Mr. CAFFERY. Very well.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator says that we made a mistake in ratifying the Spanish treaty. I want to know what the Senator would have done instead of ratifying the treaty—what his course would have been? I do not recall what he said about the treaty at the time it was pending?

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, I exerted my utmost powers to procure from the Congress of the United States a declaration in a joint resolution, just as was done in the case of Cuba, that the Filipinos are, and ought to be, a free and independent people. That is what I think ought to have been done, and I think the resolution of the Senator from Colorado—which was a most admirable resolution, and which he himself says, if he had thought of it at the time, he would have made apply to the Philippines—if applied to the Philippines, would have covered the case exactly; it would fill all the requirements of the situation. If we had promised the Filipinos just that sort of autonomy, just that sort of freedom that we declared we would give to Cuba, we would not have had a ripple of excitement, nor would there have been the slightest insurrection in those islands.

Mr. TELLER. Would that have taken the place of the treaty?

Mr. CAFFERY. We should not have ratified that treaty.

Mr. TELLER. What right would we have had there unless we ratified the treaty? What amendment would the Senator have proposed to the treaty?

Mr. CAFFERY. Just the amendment that my friend the Senator from Missouri offered to the treaty, substantially embodying the same proposition that the Senator from Colorado inserted in the Cuban declaration.

Mr. TELLER. Then the Senator would have made a treaty with Spain by which we should guarantee to those people freedom?

Mr. CAFFERY. We would have amended the treaty. It was the easiest thing in the world to do. Spain would have done anything we wanted her to do.

Mr. TELLER. We did not want her to do anything.

Mr. CAFFERY. Spain was compelled to cede the Philippines almost at the point of the bayonet—everybody knows that—and Spain would have signed a treaty in which there was incorporated the same declaration in regard to the Philippines that we incorporated in reference to Cuba.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Louisiana allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CAFFERY. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPOONER. I wish to ask the Senator, if he believes, as he has asserted several times here this afternoon, that at the time of the ratification of the treaty there was a de facto government over there, and that the people are capable of self-government, would he have voted for such an amendment to the treaty as to the Philippines as he voted for as to Cuba? What business would we have had then to stay there a day or an hour?

Mr. CAFFERY. We declared in regard to Cuba that the Cubans were virtually independent; that they were and ought to be a free and independent people. That is what we declared, and that is what we had a right to declare in regard to the Philippines. If we did not want to wage this war of extermination on the Filipinos we could have amended the treaty. It was sought to be amended, but the amendment was defeated and thrown out. If we had embodied in the treaty of Paris the declaration to which I refer, the Filipinos would have been free—just as free as the Cubans. Of course we would have been bound to see that that declaration was not an empty phrase. We would have been bound to see that that declaration was carried out in good faith, and that they did establish there a free government. After that we would have retired, as we propose to do in the case of Cuba.

Mr. CARTER. Will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. CAFFERY. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARTER. I understood the Senator to state that the Filipinos are unfit for self-government. I will ask how he reconciles to that statement his assertion that he believes we should have caused those people to be declared a free and independent people, charged with all the responsibilities of an independent government?

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, we speak of self-government after the manner of our self-government—a representative government. I do not believe that those people are capable of that sort of government any more than I believe that most of the South American States are capable of that sort of government; but I believe they are capable of making a government of their own on their own consent, not entirely based upon the representative principle. That is what I believe. I have never stated that they were incapable of some kind of government. I have stated, or intended to state, that they were incapable of that sort of government which we enjoy; and there are very few people in the world who are capable of the kind of government we enjoy.

I do not consider the facts in regard to the condition of the Philippine Islands at the time of the destruction of the Spanish fleet and prior and subsequent to that time as being of the high importance of the great principles of our Government, applicable to territories that we may happen to acquire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Will the Senator from Louisiana please suspend? The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the unfinished business may be laid aside temporarily to allow the Senator from Louisiana to complete his speech.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the Senator from Louisiana will proceed.

Mr. CAFFERY resumed his speech. After having spoken altogether two hours and forty minutes,

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Louisiana suggests to me that he would prefer to conclude his argument in the morning, and if he will yield the floor, I should like to ask consent to have a little bill passed, to which I think there will be no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield?

Mr. CAFFERY. Yes, sir.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT NASHUA, N. H.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate consider the bill (S. 26) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Nashua, in the State of New Hampshire. A similar bill has passed the Senate three times already.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire a site and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office and other Government offices in the city of Nashua, N. H., the cost of the site and building complete not to exceed $100,000, which sum is appropriated.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC LANDS AT HOT SPRINGS, ARK.

Mr. BERRY. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 6073) to amend section 4 of the act of Congress approved June 16, 1880, granting to the city of Hot Springs, Ark., certain lands as a city park, and for other purposes. It is now on the desk. I reported it this morning.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT EVANSTON, WYO.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator from Minnesota yield one moment, that I may have passed a bill which I am very anxious to get through? A similar bill passed at the last session.

Mr. DAVIS. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask leave to call up at this time the bill (S. 329) to provide for and purchase a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Evanston, in the State of Wyoming.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire a site, and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, for the use and accommodation of the United States courts, post-office, land offices, and for other Government purposes, at Evanston, Wyo., the cost of the site and building complete not to exceed $100,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CUSTER COUNTY, MONT.

Mr. CARTER. Will the Senator from Minnesota yield to me?

Mr. DAVIS. I will.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 704) for the relief of the county of Custer, State of Montana.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the board of county commissioners of Custer County, Mont., $4,350, in full settlement of all demands against the United States for the construction of a steel bridge across the Tongue River for the accommodation of the Fort Keogh Military Reservation, in Montana.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SOLDIERS' HOME AT CASTLE PINCKNEY, SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Minnesota withhold his motion for a moment longer to allow me to have a little bill passed? I do not think it will lead to any discussion.

Mr. DAVIS. I yield.

Mr. ALLISON. What is it about?

Mr. TILLMAN. It is about a soldiers' home. I want an appropriation for my country. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1018) to establish a branch home of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers at Castle Pinckney, in Charleston Harbor, South Carolina, or some other eligible site in or near that city, for the use of disabled officers and enlisted men of the Volunteer Army and Navy of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I happened to be out of town when this bill was taken around the Chamber to obtain the consent of the Military Affairs Committee, and I am not sure that I am satisfied with it. I ask the Senator from South Carolina to let it lie for a day, or possibly two, and then we can consult the proper authorities of the War Department and see what is really in the proposition, for I have my serious doubts as to whether those islands are healthful. They were unhealthful to some of us when we were living around Charleston. I ask that the bill may lie over a day or two.

Mr. TILLMAN. Very well.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. DAVIS. I renew the motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 5, 1900.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

LEAVE TO PRINT IN THE RECORD.

Mr. DALY of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, on the 19th of last month I submitted some remarks, pending the appropriation bill, on the Gage resolution. I have been engaged since that time trying cases in my State, and did not submit the remarks——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend until the House is in order. It is impossible for the Chair to hear what is being said. Gentlemen will cease conversation and resume their seats. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. DALY].

Mr. DALY of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, on the 19th day of January I submitted some remarks to the House on the Gage resolution, and held the same for revision and extension in the RECORD. Immediately thereafter I was called home to try some causes and was absent until the latter part of last week and failed to submit the remarks within the time limited under the rule. I now ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD these remarks. I ask for five days.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks upon the Gage resolution, having failed to do so within the time limited. He asks for five days' time. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

JOHN ANDERSON.

Mr. FLYNN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 6493) for the relief of John Anderson, a Pottawatomie Indian, and his adult children.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue a fee simple patent to John Anderson and the following adult children of said John Anderson, to wit, Julia Anderson, John Anderson, jr., Thomas Anderson, Eliza Anderson, and Maggie Anderson, to all the land now held by them and purchased from the United States under the act of May 23, 1872, and located in Pottawatomie County, Oklahoma Territory.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PAYNE. I hope that we shall have some statement, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. FLYNN. I ask that the report be read.

The report (by Mr. FLYNN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6493) for the relief of John Anderson, a Pottawatomie Indian, and his adult children, beg leave to report that they have had the same under consideration and report that the bill do pass, and attach as part hereof the correspondence had with the Interior Department concerning said bill.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 26, 1900.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 17th instant, requesting report on the accompanying H. R. 6493, "A bill for the relief of John Anderson, a Pottawatomie Indian, and his adult children."

This bill provides for the issuance of a fee-simple patent to John Anderson and his five children to all the land now held by them and purchased from the United States under the act of May 23, 1872, and located in Pottawatomie County, Okla.

In response thereto I transmit herewith a copy of a report, dated the 24th instant, from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in which recommendation is made for the passage of the bill.

The Commissioner's recommendation meets with my approval.

Very respectfully,

E. A. HITCHCOCK, Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS,
House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, January 24, 1900.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt, by your reference, for consideration, report, and recommendation, of a letter from Hon. J. S. SHERMAN, dated January 17, 1900, submitting House bill No. 6493, entitled "A bill for the relief of John Anderson, a Pottawatomie Indian, and his adult children."

In reply I have to state that the said John Anderson is a bright, intelligent man, of fine business qualifications, upon whom this office largely depends for information as to members of the tribe, their identity, and, in case of deceased Pottawatomies, who are their sole heirs and how they became such—important data required of a business committee of six members of the Pottawatomie tribe in the consideration of deeds of conveyance of land in Oklahoma Territory by the several allottees of the Pottawatomie Nation under act of Congress approved August 15, 1894.

Mr. Anderson and his children took their allotments under the act of May 23, 1872 (17 Stats., 159), which required payment therefor and only permitted the issuance of certificates by this office as evidence of title in and to said lands, and their sale was restricted to persons of Indian blood residing within the then Indian Territory, with the approval of the President. If any Indian, by reason of his intelligence and frugality, is deserving of a patent in fee for his land, surely John Anderson is. I take great pleasure in recommending the passage of this bill.

I return herewith said bill and submit a copy of this report.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. A. JONES, Commissioner.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SHATTUC, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

REPRINT OF A BILL.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a reprint of 500 copies of House bill No. 15, introduced by Mr. BROSIUS, providing for a retirement fund for clerks. The supply is exhausted, and there is much demand for it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] asks unanimous consent for a reprint of House bill No. 15 of 500 copies——

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the request for 500 copies and let it stand simply for a reprint.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for a reprint of House bill No. 15. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

POLLUTION OF WATER SUPPLY.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the rules of the House be suspended for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5) to appoint a commission for the investigation of the pollution of water supplies where such pollution affects or threatens to affect the sanitary condition of the people of more than one State.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a scientific commission shall be appointed to investigate fully the subject of the pollution of rivers and other natural sources of water supply where the sanitary condition of the people of more than one State is affected or threatened to be affected by such pollution, this commission to consist of five members, to be appointed by the President, by and with the consent of the Senate, whose compensation during the time when actually engaged in the performance of their duties under this act shall be $10 per diem each and reasonable expenses.

SEC. 2. That the commission shall meet in Washington, D. C., within thirty days after the passage of this act, to consider the methods to be adopted in the investigation, and it shall have authority and be empowered to make use of the services of chemical, bacteriological, and sanitary experts, and of such persons as it may judge most competent by reason of their special knowledge and experience to afford it correct information on the subject of its inquiry, as well in formulating its methods as in carrying them into effect. It shall meet thereafter from time to time at such places as it may consider best suited for the furtherance of its inquiry.

SEC. 3. That the commission shall report to Congress at its next session the progress made in the investigation undertaken under this act, and shall submit such suggestions as may seem desirable, with the view of remedying any insanitary conditions that have been developed by its work.

SEC. 4. That the sum of $30,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated to pay the salaries and expenses of said commission and carry out the purposes of this act.

With the following amendments recommended by the committee:

In line 3, page 1, insert, after "a" and before "commission," the word "scientific."

In line 7, page 1, strike out "three" and insert "five."

In line 11, page 1, strike out the words "$10 per diem" and insert in lieu thereof the words "at the rate of $5,000 per annum."

In lines 2 and 3, page 2, strike out the words "passage of this act" and insert in lieu thereof the words "date of its appointment."

In line 13, page 2, insert, after "report" and before "to," the word "finally."

In line 14, page 2, strike out "progress made in" and insert in lieu thereof the words "results of."

In line 16, page 2, strike out "insanitary" and insert in lieu thereof the word "unsanitary."

In line 18, page 2, strike out the word "thirty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "forty."

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. HOPKINS. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, that I am opposed to this bill, but I demand a second.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Missouri has twenty minutes.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill unanimously recommended by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. It provides for an investigation of the pollution of water supplies. The investigation is to be conducted by a nonpartisan scientific commission to be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate. This, together with a small appropriation, is all that is asked for in this measure. I believe there is no member on this floor who is not interested, from a due regard for the health and lives of his constituents, in the success of this legislation, and a mere statement of the object of the bill seems to me to be sufficient to commend it not only to the members of this House, but to all thoughful and well-meaning citizens of this country.

In our country, as everyone knows, it is the universal practice to discharge the waste of manufacturing establishments and the filth and sewage of cities into the rivers. The question presented in this bill is whether this can longer be permitted to be done without injuriously affecting the health and lives of our people and whether, if the pollution is found to threaten life, it will not be advisable to stop this nefarious practice by legislation. We must remember that it is one of the inalienable rights of the people to have the water for drinking, for watering stock, for manufacturing, agricultural, and domestic uses come to them in its natural and accustomed flow, free from sewage and pollution; and since it is a notorious fact, known to everyone, that this right has not been properly protected, such protection becomes the legitimate object of legislation and a duty and necessity.

Right here, Mr. Speaker, I ask the Clerk to read an extract from consular reports which were made in the year 1895 in response to an inquiry of the State Department upon this very subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

The soil of many of our cities, saturated with the putrefying contents of cesspools and leaking sewers, emits at certain seasons the poisonous emanations which generate typhoid fever, yellow fever, diphtheria, dysentery, and cholera, while the waters of our principal rivers are too often converted into open sewers teeming with pestilential exhalations. The government of every State, whose duty it should be to superintend and watch over the health of the community at large, would do wisely to lay down and carry out an efficient, complete, and common-sense plan of drainage and sewerage for every town and city of the commonwealth.

Were the fearful consequences which result from the reprehensible practice of converting our rivers into open sewers properly understood and properly estimated by the public, no expenditure of time or money would be deemed too great to put an end to a system so disgusting and so destructive to the health and lives of the community at large, but more especially of those whose avocations necessitate their daily and hourly exposure to the evil. Unless this suicidal practice is abated by penal enactment, our cities will ultimately become the hotbeds of pestilence and plagues, such as prevailed in the middle ages.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, the reports following these introductory remarks show that the large cities of nearly all civilized countries have long ago discontinued the barbarous practice of dumping filth and sewage into their running streams. Either the sewage is subjected to a process of purification before it is so discharged, as in London, or it is utilized for irrigation purposes, as in Berlin and other cities. Is it not high time that this subject is taken up here? There is no difference of opinion among sanitary experts and physicians as to the supreme necessity of the case. They are all agreed that the high death rate of typhoid fever in nearly all our large cities is directly traceable to our primitive methods of sewage disposal, and especially to the pollution of our river water. For the present we are not asked to inquire into the methods of remedying the evil, but we are asked by the people and the press to provide for an investigation, an inquiry as to the extent and the nature of the evil; then Congress can make the official reports on this question the basis for further legislative action.

What are we doing? We have city boards of health and State boards of health, but what has been done for the protection of health nationally? By quarantine regulations, it is true, we have endeavored to protect our people against infection from outside, and our Marine-Hospital Service has been very efficient in this respect. But when it comes to the question of infection from within our borders, very little, if anything, has been done. It may be argued that under our system of government this is left to the several States, but how about cases where one State suffers from the practices of another State? Shall the District of Columbia make war upon Maryland because the people of that State are polluting the water of the Potomac? Shall the people of Ohio invade the State of Pennsylvania with an armed force to stop the people of Pittsburg from discharging their factory waste and their sewage into the Ohio River? Shall Missouri read the riot act to the people of Chicago and Illinois because the nasty contents of the Chicago Drainage Canal, recently opened, are being emptied into the Mississippi? Ah, you say the Federal courts will provide a remedy in such cases. True, but this surely does not acquit us of our responsibility and duty. Legislation is had to prevent litigation by establishing certain general rules of conduct and by furnishing at the same time an authoritative measure according to which justice is meted out to all alike. Official reports of a Government commission will largely obviate the necessity of taking expert testimony in court and will be instrumental in each court proceeding in determining the facts. Every consideration of public welfare demands the speedy enactment of legislation of this kind.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to add that this bill has been recommended by the legislatures as well as the State boards of health of a large number of States, and its passage has been strongly urged by the National Medical Association, an organization of physicians extending into every State of the Union.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri if he undertakes to claim that under the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States no remedy can be invoked by a State where such pollution exists as that to which he refers?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I have just stated, Mr. Speaker, that the remedy did exist to a certain extent in the Federal courts. But this does not acquit Congress of its duty and responsibility to the people of the country to protect them against this pollution.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But you are speaking now of the enactment of legislation for a commission to go all over the country and investigate the pollution of rivers without reference to the demand of the people of localities for protection in that regard.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Wherever the water is used for drinking purposes or agricultural purposes or domestic purposes this commission can be called upon to proceed to the locality indicated and make an investigation and make its report upon the subject.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But what about the conflict of jurisdiction between the United States and the States? You establish here at once a policy which necessarily leads to a conflict of jurisdiction on matter of State polity.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. The gentleman is mistaken in that. That point has been already settled by the enactment of the national quarantine law.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But this is evidently an enlargement of the quarantine laws, although there is no question of any pollution affecting a whole section, such as the quarantine laws usually apply to.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. If the gentleman desires to occupy some time, I will yield to him.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Not just now.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Then I reserve the balance of my time. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has nine minutes remaining.

Mr. RICHARDSON rose.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I promised to yield to the senior gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. I now yield him five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, this seems to be a proposition to appoint a commission of five persons—a scientific commission—to investigate fully the subject of the pollution of rivers and other natural sources of water supply. The pay of these commissioners is to be $5,000 each, and the bill appropriates $40,000. It is true the bill makes provision that a final report shall be made to the next Congress; but I think I may fairly prophesy that if this commission be organized its work will be extended for the next year, and the next year, and the next year, and for many years to come.

Now, if this be an important investigation, and if this be the best way to make it, well and good; then let us make it in this way. But, in my judgment, if this investigation should be made at all, there are better ways of making it. I know it is not worth while to talk about economy, and I will not talk of this question from that standpoint.

I repeat, that if there is no other way to do this important work as it ought to be done than by the appointment of a commission, then let us appoint a commission. But I think that if this work is necessary, there is a better way of doing it under existing law. We have a National Academy of Sciences which, for the bare payment of traveling expenses, has done better work on great questions than any or all of the commissions that have ever been appointed. We can under the law refer this matter to that eminent body—nonpartisan, patriotic, capable—and we shall get a prompt report.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. CANNON. I have but five minutes. I will yield to the gentleman at the conclusion of my remarks if I have any time left.

That is one way to do this work—through the National Academy of Sciences. There is another way to do it. We have a Marine-Hospital Service engaged in investigating questions of this very kind. That body expends $100,000, $200,000, $300,000, $400,000 a year in the investigation of sanitary questions. Now, let me say, measuring my words, that I believe that this Marine-Hospital Service is more competent than a dozen commissions would be to do this work. If it is important to have this investigation and to arrive at the facts, the Marine-Hospital Service already has the material, the laboratories, etc., for doing this work. It is already doing work along the line of these investigations. Let us refer this matter to that body, if it is necessary to have an investigation, and we shall in that way get the facts.

Commissions, after they investigate, make reports, which are printed and which then sleep the long sleep of death. Nobody reads them. Why, sir, you can find about this Capitol reports of commissions by the cord which have been made during the last dozen years on subjects which most of us did not know were being investigated or reported upon.

Now, as I understand from the dispatches, there is a case pending that meets my friend's view. What moves him, I apprehend, is the question of sewage from Illinois that may reach Missouri.

Mr. BARTHOLDT rose.

Mr. CANNON. I have but five minutes, and the gentleman must excuse me. I presume that is what moves him. Under the law and the Constitution, if the dispatches can be trusted, there is already pending in the court of last resort—the Supreme Court of the United States—this very question. They have got to take the evidence; they have got to try the case; they have got to settle this case of pollution of the national water courses and how the public health in the various States would be affected. And when they come with a judgment it will cover the whole ground. What is the use of vexing the atmosphere with this commission and that commission? If it is wise at all to make an investigation of this sort with this litigation pending, then let us, as I have suggested, utilize the National Academy of Sciences, which can do the work without expense ably and fairly, or, if you will not utilize the National Academy, let us utilize the Marine-Hospital Service.

Now, that is all I want to say; and if I have any time left I yield it to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT].

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Very well; I will take my own time.

Mr. CANNON. I had no wish to be discourteous. If the gentleman will yield to me a minute or two I will answer any question he may wish to put.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] for five minutes.

Mr. HOPKINS. If agreeable to the Chair, I will allow the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] to yield to my colleague, in order to answer his question.

Mr. CANNON. I did not intend to be discourteous, nor did I want to dodge any question.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is understood that this does not come out of our time.

The SPEAKER. It comes out of the time of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. The gentleman from Illinois has stated that St. Louis is interested in this question. I say yes. If he wants to put the matter in that way, I am perfectly willing to admit that I speak for the people of St. Louis and for the protection of their health and their lives.

Mr. CANNON. Is not the matter being litigated now?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. If the gentleman wants to be put in a position of defending the claims of Chicago, I have no objection to his pursuing that course; but, if I am correct, a gentleman representing Chicago on this floor [Mr. MANN] is a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and he has no objection to this bill. The drainage commissioners in Chicago have unanimously passed a resolution advocating the passage of this bill, so that not only in St. Louis and in Chicago, but all over the country, we may have a fair examination by bacteriologists of the highest standing upon this very important question.

Mr. CANNON. I should like just a minute.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield a minute to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. Now, let me say to my friend that I do not represent Chicago as against St. Louis, or St. Louis as against Chicago, two great, powerful cities; but I stand here as a Representative in Congress. I do not know what the drainage district wants, nor what the Representative from Cook County wants, but I say in the interest of the public service, in my judgment, no good result is to be had from the organization of this commission, and upon my own authority, independent of everybody else, I record my protest against it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] has five minutes.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, the answer just made by the gentleman who introduced this bill to my colleague [Mr. CANNON] discloses the motive that prompts him to ask Congress to pass this bill, which is to practically appropriate $40,000 for the benefit of the city of St. Louis and the State of Missouri.

Now, gentlemen will observe that the bill creates a commission composed of five members and gives each of these members a salary of $5,000 per annum, thus absorbing, if they take a year, $25,000 of the proposed $40,000.

In addition to that they are allowed also their reasonable expenses, which, in my judgment, would more than double the amount of the salary, because no commission can investigate the rivers of this country for the pittance of $15,000. They will be required to charter a vessel of some kind or character, to go up and down these various rivers, at a large expense to the General Government, so that when they come to make their report, instead of taking $40,000 out of the Treasury of the United States, it will cost from one hundred to two hundred thousand dollars.

Is there any necessity for this, from a national standpoint? Every gentleman familiar with the legislation of our country and the powers and authorities delegated to these various bureaus and departments knows that the Marine-Hospital Service of the Government has absolute control and jurisdiction over this subject. The Marine-Hospital Service is to-day engaged in this very question that is embodied in this bill, and the Marine-Hospital Service, Mr. Speaker, can control revenue cutters, with which they can go into any of the rivers or bays or inlets at a less expense to the Government than would be incurred by this proposed commission, and their investigations are of a nonpartisan character and will be much more important to the general public and to Congress than any investigation that might be made by a commission of this kind.

Then we come back, Mr. Speaker, to this proposition: There being no reason from a national standpoint why an extra commission should be appointed and this extra expense incurred, is there any reason from a State standpoint? The States of this Union have absolute jurisdiction within their limits, and the cities within those States have jurisdiction likewise, and you will find that not only the States, but all the great cities have commissions appointed to look out for and protect the general public from the pollution of any of the rivers, inlets, or bays, and they have, as I say, plenary power within the limits of the State. Now, as between the city of St. Louis and the city of Chicago, is there any reason for this legislation? Why is this newborn zeal of my friend from the city of St. Louis, one of the Representatives from Missouri? He has been in Congress here, to my knowledge, six or eight years, an energetic, pushing, able Representative, but until recently he had never thought that there was any necessity for such legislation as this.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Just a moment, Mr. Speaker. I desire to say to my friend that this bill was introduced in the Fifty-third Congress by myself, long before anybody thought of the Chicago Drainage Canal ever becoming a danger to the city of St. Louis and its people.

Mr. HOPKINS. Well, I will say, Mr. Speaker, that that bill has been buried with the mass of proposed legislation that has never been brought to the attention of the House. To my knowledge, this is the first time in the history of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] that it has ever been pressed upon the attention of Congress in the manner now proposed.

Now, as has been said by my colleague [Mr. CANNON], there is on this question of drainage between the State of Illinois and the State of Missouri a case pending in the Supreme Court of the United States. The State of Missouri has commenced a suit in the Supreme Court, under the provisions of the Constitution, to test this very question of the pollution of rivers, streams, etc., and the State of Illinois, in due time, will make response to that. That is the issue presented, and evidence will be taken in that lawsuit as to whether any of the rivers in Illinois or those in Missouri or that pass by or through it will be polluted by the action of the city of Chicago. I want to know, Mr. Speaker, if the members of this House propose to make an appropriation here for the State of Missouri to litigate a question against the State of Illinois. If Missouri is in that financial condition that the hat should be passed around, let it be done in a private manner and not come to the Treasury of the United States. [Laughter.]

The gentleman ought to know that if this evidence is taken it can not be used under the law at all; and I trust that the members——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, one feature of this measure presents an evil that is growing in this country and which calls for prompt correction. It is a custom which has become general of appointing commissioners to consider legislative subjects, to voice the wish of Administrations and not the wish of the people, to control the sentiments of the people and not to echo them. Numerous commissions in late years have been appointed, not to protect the voter, but to formulate policies for an Administration. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] says that the reports of the commissioners are useless, as a rule, and are usually buried without reading.

This is a strong argument for economy and against the creation of commissions. But I differ from the gentleman as to many of these commissions, and we find many of their reports brought in and presented to this House, and their superior opportunity for investigating the facts is urged as a reason why we should follow their recommendations. But, sir, they do not represent our constituencies, and every time you authorize a commission to consider legislative subjects you are abdicating your rights as sovereign representatives of the people, not to mention the great expense with which you are burdening them by such creations, and not to mention other evils ensuing.

I have known men with principles firm set and intolerant to be mellowed and won over by the glitter of a commission. Scores of commissions are being appointed, and so far members here are relinquishing their sovereignty and the rights and interest of their constituents. I protest against it.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has seven minutes remaining.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. PEARRE. Mr. Speaker, this bill comes before the House with a favorable report from the committee, and I desire to say in the very limited time allotted to me that I heartily favor this provision; and more, the additional provisions which I favor are embodied in a bill which I offered to this House early in the present session. This provision adds to the provisions of this bill penalties for the pollution of streams which are the source of water supply to the people of the various cities and towns of the United States. While I favor this bill, I think it incomplete in that it does not define the crime and furnish a penalty for the violation of the law. However, I desire to add my voice to that of the gentleman from Missouri in advocacy of this measure. It has been suggested here by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] that the zeal of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] is new born.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps the zeal may be new born; but it is better that the gentleman from Missouri should be inspired by a newborn zeal to perform a long-neglected public duty than that he should smother in the womb of an unfulfilled duty the zeal which should characterize members upon this floor in regard to the provisions of this bill. Mr. Speaker, this is a matter which is urging the consideration of the people of the United States. The various rivers of the United States have been investigated, and principally among them the Potomac River, on the banks of which I live, and which furnishes the water supply to the District of Columbia, the seat of the National Government. It has already been determined, I will say to my valued friend from Illinois, that the Potomac River is polluted, and that has been determined by the Marine-Hospital Service. It has also been determined——

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman allow me right there to interrupt him?

Mr. PEARRE. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. If it is true that that work has been done by the Marine-Hospital Service, you can not do anything more than that by this bill.

Mr. PEARRE. I favor additional provisions, and I think that this bill is a step in the right direction.

Mr. HOPKINS. This will not do anything that can not be done by the Marine-Hospital Service.

Mr. PEARRE. I will say in reply to the gentleman that this bill provides for a recommendation of remedial legislation.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will yield three minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. DALY].

Mr. DALY of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, for the information of the gentleman from Missouri, let me say to him that if he will consult the laws of New Jersey for the last two years he will find this subject-matter considered; and if he will consult the law reports of New Jersey for the last year he will find that the citizens of New Jersey have enjoined the city of Paterson from dumping its sewage into the waters of the river Passaic, and the entire matter is covered in the decisions, as well as by legislation.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. DALY of New Jersey. Certainly.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Does not that relate to a stream altogether within the boundary lines of your State?

Mr. DALY of New Jersey. Yes; but that does not prevent the circuit court of the United States from taking jurisdiction as between two States.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. But this entirely relates to a case where the health of the people of more than one State is affected.

Mr. DALY of New Jersey. If the citizens of Illinois and the citizens of Missouri are injured, or vice versa, one citizen can restrain the other by injunction from the circuit court of the United States the same as a State court would enjoin its own private citizens. There is a complete remedy at law without appealing to the Congress of the United States.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, how much time is left in opposition to the bill?

The SPEAKER. Six minutes remain under the control of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Does the gentleman from Missouri wish to occupy any time now?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. No.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I only want to say a word——

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I did not understand him. If he desires to yield me his six minutes, I desire to accept. There are several gentlemen who have asked me for time to speak in favor of the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. No; I want to say a word in opposition to the measure. So far as I am concerned, I am not opposed to the investigation of the pollution of the water of any stream. I have no objection to the investigation being conducted by the Government experts under the direction of the Government; but I submit that we already have sufficient machinery to enable us to make this investigation. We have a number of bureaus that have been referred to by gentlemen who have spoken against the measure, and I am of opinion that they are not overcrowded with work. They have experts, and we are paying them annual salaries and carrying them on the pay roll.

Let us give them something to do. I am opposed to creating a commission of five additional experts now and giving the President of the United States the power to appoint them, to be sent out at all times, and perhaps to be carried along permanently. We have the Bureau for the Promotion of American Science, the Marine Bureau; we have experts in the Agricultural Deparment and in the bureaus of that great Executive Department of the Government, and they can make all this investigation and report to Congress. And then, as stated by the gentleman from New Jersey, the courts already, in my judgment, have ample jurisdiction to take care of this question. I am opposed to creating a commission of five additional experts with the large salaries mentioned. So far as I am concerned, I am content to have a vote taken on the measure. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I merely desire to say, in answer to the gentleman from Tennessee, that this question of intrusting the Marine-Hospital Service with this work has been thoroughly gone over by the committee. In order to elevate this investigation beyond the possibility of sectional prejudice it was deemed wise to have an impartial nonpartisan commission appointed by the President of the United States, without regard to geographical lines and the sections of the country which are interested in this legislation. It is a well-known fact that the superintendent of the Marine-Hospital Service is a St. Louis gentleman, and while he is an excellent official, we want neither a St. Louis gentleman nor a gentleman from Chicago to be intrusted with this work; and in this instance a gentleman from Chicago happens to be Secretary of the Treasury. We want an impartial, independent commission, free from all sectional preferences and clothed with the highest national authority, a commission which will inspire the confidence so essential to the success of this legislation, and which can come into the House and say to us, "Here are the facts as we have found them; they are absolutely true and reliable, and now base your further action and future legislation on our report."

Mr. TERRY. Why not let the Interstate Commerce Committee of the House investigate it?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, this bill is not an attack on the city of Chicago, as these overzealous gentlemen from Illinois seem to imagine. They say that they have no feeling of that kind, and yet I undertake to say that all the opposition inspired against this measure comes from the city of Chicago. They think in some way that it is an attack on their new drainage system. It is not true. The purpose of this bill is much broader than that. There is a dispute among scientists as to whether or no streams once polluted do speedily purify themselves, and it was to ascertain the very facts with regard to so important a matter as that that this bill found favor with the committee. This is not a new question, but it is one constantly growing in importance. As our cities become more and more populous, as they have drainage systems pouring into the depressions, all of them pouring into the drainage at the head of the streams and along the banks of the streams from which great multitudes of people draw all their drinking water, it is a matter of supreme importance that we should know what the actual facts are.

Some gentlemen say that in a distance of 400 miles, as the current flows in the Mississippi River, the water is purified. Others say in a distance of 15 miles this purification occurs. Now, there is a great range for dispute, and we want to know the actual facts. A little while ago a court found that the waters of the Potomac River north of us, or west of us, was not polluted, and failed to give relief; and yet every man who has passed along the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad has noticed the condition of the Potomac River for a distance of more than 30 miles below the city of Cumberland. I want to know, for one—I think other members of the House want to know—whether or not there is danger from this source. The gentleman from Illinois suggests that we have abundant means, and yet in one hundred years these means have not been invoked. It is necessary that some power should put them in motion. The society to which he refers has not yet undertaken the work which he says they are so well qualified to perform.

The power that might control, perhaps, has not done it, except in the case of the Potomac River, and there, according to my recollection, there was special authority given by Congress.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield one minute to the gentleman from St. Louis [Mr. JOY], although I believe that he is on the opposite side of the question from myself.

Mr. JOY. Mr. Speaker, by the courtesy of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] I want to say one word in behalf of this measure. It is not one in which St. Louis is arrayed against Chicago. I had charge of this bill in the Committee on Commerce, and every member of that committee—from the North and the South, from the Republican side and the Democratic side, from St. Louis and from Chicago—joined me in advocating the measure and requesting that it pass. Representing in that committee the city of Chicago was a gentleman from that city [Mr. MANN], who seconded the motion that the bill be reported with a favorable recommendation.

This is a bill providing for a high scientific commission to pass upon these questions—not in the interest of St. Louis as against Chicago, nor in any other interest but that the people of the United States and especially that the people of my city shall be convinced, as I believe they will be, that this influx of sewage from Chicago through the Illinois River would not injure the health of the people of the great city of St. Louis.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. BARTHOLDT to suspend the rules and pass the bill, it was not agreed to; there being—ayes 66, noes 87.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. WHITE. I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHITE. I ask the Clerk to read the marked article which I send to the desk.

Mr. CUMMINGS. From what paper?

Mr. WHITE. From the News and Observer, published at Raleigh, N. C.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE COLORED MEMBER.

It is bad enough that North Carolina should have the only nigger Congressman. It is sufficiently humiliating to the white people of the Second district; a sad enough commentary upon the political conditions that have obtained in this State. What shall be said when that nigger Congressman gives utterance to the following on the floor of the House?—

"I have investigated the lynchings in the South and find that less than 15 per cent of them are due to the crime of rape. And I desire to announce here that if it were not for the assaults of white men upon black women, there would be less of the other class."

Thus does the Manleyism of 1898 show its head in 1900. Manley slandered white women in a scurrilous negro newspaper having a local circulation; WHITE justifies assaults by negroes on white women by slandering white men in a speech in the Congress of the United States. We are told that "the public galleries contained many colored people who applauded this utterance vigorously."

So far as this particular negro is personally concerned, he may be dismissed as beneath contempt. There is a far graver side to the matter. This negro is regarded by his race as a leader; he both reflects the sentiment of his race, and his utterances react upon his followers with an effect that was made sufficiently plain by the "vigorous applause" with which his slander was greeted by the negroes in the gallery. As the blatant mouthing of a mere negro, WHITE's utterances are not worth notice; as a fresh manifestation of negroism, of what the negro's attitude is toward the white man, now and always, its significance should not be allowed to escape us.

When a negro of some education and of more than ordinary intelligence among his race can so far forget himself as to use such language in a speech on the floor of Congress, what is to be expected of the more ignorant of his followers? If there were no other reason, this utterance of WHITE's is sufficient to show the absolute necessity of permanent white rule in this State. It makes plain the fact that the negro has learned nothing from experience, and that he is utterly devoid of all sense of official responsibility and of public decency—nay, more, that the negro in office regards himself as the enemy of the white man and is anxious to have his race share in that sentiment. Therefore he becomes a menace to the peace of the Commonwealth and a danger to the safety of both races.

The "inoffensive negro official" is largely a myth. The negro may be inoffensive as a private citizen, but with his induction into office he becomes a new individual. WHITE is typical of his kind. Venomous, forward, slanderous of the whites, appealing to the worst passions of his own race, he emphasizes anew the need of making an end of him and his kind. That is what the white people of this State propose to do. They have had enough of Manleyism. They have more than enough of Negro Congressman WHITE. He must be made an impossibility for the future, and will be. The people of this State will not tolerate that sort of thing. This has been made sufficiently plain already. And after next August it will be so plain that even WHITE, PRITCHARD, BUTLER, and all advocates of Manleyism will be able to understand it.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to give that vile, slanderous publication the widest possible circulation. I desire that it shall go out through the documents of this House that the world may see what the poor colored man in the Southland has to undergo from a certain class.

In making this statement it is proper, Mr. Speaker, that I should exonerate a very large percentage of the white people of North Carolina, my native State. No better people live anywhere on God's green earth than some of them. But, unfortunately, men of the type of him who wrote that article are now in the ascendency.

I desire to repudiate as slanderous and wholly untrue the utterances there attributed to me. I did the other day, while my colleague [Mr. LINNEY] was speaking, interject a remark to the effect that from an investigation which I made last summer, as stated in a paper which I read before a local organization of this city, I had found that less than 15 per cent of the lynchings in this country were for assaults committed upon women, not in the South, but in the entire United States. I repeat that utterance. I did not justify the commission of assaults by black men upon white women on the ground that white men did the same in regard to black women.

I said that there were assaults occasionally committed upon women and that they were not all committed by black men upon white women, but were also committed by white men upon black women, as evidenced by the great numbers of mulattoes in the Southland. I said that then; I repeat it now; and if any man here or elsewhere desires to verify the truthfulness of that statement, he has but to make a visit through the South, where I live.

I repudiate as much as any man can anyone, whether he be a white brute or a black brute, who commits an assault upon any woman, whether a white woman or a black woman. I think such a man ought to be hung—hung by the neck until dead. But it ought to be done by the courts, not by an infuriated mob such as the writer of that article would incite.

Mr. Speaker, this article is but an evidence of what we have got to contend with—an absolute perversion and slanderous misrepresentation of the truth—preparing for the election to be held in August. And the world is notified that those whom the Constitution of these United States, by the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments, has enfranchised are to be reduced once more to the condition of goods and chattels, if such men as the one who edits the News and Observer can have the control of affairs in North Carolina.

As I said before, I want to give the fullest publication to the utterances of this vile sheet; and I want my colleagues in this House, both Democrats and Republicans, with Populists thrown in, to judge my character and my conduct for the last three years on this floor and say whether or not it has conformed to the description given by this fellow who edits the News and Observer and pollutes the country with such literature as has been read at the desk. [Applause.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Pending that motion, I would like to have an opportunity to ask unanimous consent to occupy ten minutes. The body of Major-General Lawton to-day lies in my home town—his home—and I would like an opportunity to offer a few remarks on that subject.

Mr. HITT. I will withdraw my motion in order to give the gentleman an opportunity to ask consent.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent to occupy ten minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that ten minutes be accorded him to make some remarks upon the life and character of General Lawton. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Indiana will proceed.

MAJ. GEN. HENRY W. LAWTON.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, while I speak these words of tribute here the body of General Lawton lies in state at his town and mine, Fort Wayne, in northern Indiana, surrounded by his comrades of the Thirtieth Indiana and by friends and associates of many years.

Maj. Gen. Henry W. Lawton's name will remain in the archives of the nation to commemorate his heroism and his fidelity as a soldier.

He needs no encomium to preserve his fame save the plain, blunt facts of his service in the field.

His life from early boyhood when he enlisted at 18 at Fort Wayne till he laid it down on the field of battle was a career of activity which fulfilled every requirement of a patriotic soldier.

He won his spurs and places of honor in the Army by active service in the field, and never enjoyed the advantage and distinction that come to the college trained.

He was a true type of that strong class commonly known as citizen soldiers, the volunteers. His prowess as a warrior was tested and proven in every mode of warfare. In the civil war, from 1861 to 1865, against foemen worthy of his steel, his own race, in wars with the Indians in the West, later with the Spanish, and last in the war in the Philippines, he showed all the elements of a soldier. In private life he was modest and unassuming. General Lawton's nearly forty years' service in the Army, his long service and activity, make him one of the most deserving heroes of our country.

All Indianians recommended him for a brigadier-generalship in the Regular Army; he had won it, and the President and Senate were about to confer this distinguished honor upon him. This distinction so prized by a commander never reached General Lawton, but his name and fame will survive as if he had received it.

The generosity of individual citizens as shown to his widow voice the esteem in which he is held by them, but the Government which he served so long and well should likewise be generous to her.

Gen. Henry W. Lawton was a born fighter. Without the advantage of an education at the National Military Academy, so essential to recognition and promotion under the Army regulations, he secured a distinction that is rare in the records of our soldiers. These obstructions were overcome by severe hardships, by sore trials of endurance, by great activity, and by intrepidity in four wars. He doubtless saw the longest term of actual field service of any commander in the late history of our country.

He was repeatedly commended in general orders for "vigilance and zeal, rapidity and persistence of pursuit, great skill, perseverance and gallantry," and was awarded a medal of honor for distinguished gallantry in the war.

General Lawton was born in Ohio, March 17, 1843, but with his father moved to Fort Wayne, Ind., in 1858. A more complete summary of the interesting events of his life is presented in a letter which was read on September 19, 1899, at the reunion of his regiment, the Thirtieth Indiana, held at Millersburg, Ind., which letter reads:

HEADQUARTERS FIRST DIVISION EIGHTH ARMY CORPS,
Manila, P. I., August 8, 1899.

MY DEAR COMRADE: Your favor of June 18 has just been received, and I hasten to assure you of my sincere appreciation of the kind feeling which you express for me from yourself as well as from the comrades you represent. If it has been my good fortune, in my efforts to perform my whole duty since the commencement of our war with Spain, to earn the good opinion and admiration of my friends and comrades of the civil war, it is a sufficient and ample recompense for all the effort it has cost me. There are no people in the world who can better judge of the merits of a soldier than those who fought from 1861 to 1865, and none whose good opinion I appreciate more highly.

Concerning the proposition which you refer to—to raise money for the purpose of making some substantial expression of your appreciation of my work—I beg to assure you that your good opinion and good wishes are all that I desire, and I trust that my friends will not burden themselves further. At the same time I beg to assure you of my heartfelt appreciation of your efforts in that direction.

In reply to your inquiries concerning my birthplace, residence, early life, etc., the following, I think, will cover all the facts you desire to know:

My father resided in Fort Wayne, Ind., long before I was born, he having come to Indiana at the time of the building of the Wabash and Erie Canal. I was born, however, on the 17th day of March, 1843, at Manhattan, in the State of Ohio. Manhattan, now a suburb of Toledo, is the point near which the canal entered Lake Erie. Later my parents resided in Maumee City, Ohio, and it is there my first recollections began. I attended the primary schools, at that place, and at the age of 7 years my father went to California, and I, with my mother, moved to Lorain County, Ohio; two years later, my father having returned from California, I went with him to the West, remaining something more than a year in Iowa and about one year in Missouri.

In 1858 my father returned to Fort Wayne, and I entered the Fort Wayne Methodist Episcopal College as a student. Since that time Fort Wayne has been my home. I remained at college until the breaking out of the war in April, 1861, when I enlisted in a company organized by Capt. W. P. Segur, which became part of the Ninth Indiana Volunteers. At the close of my term of service in that regiment I returned to Fort Wayne and immediately reenlisted with Capt. O. D. Hurd, whose company became part of the Thirtieth Indiana Volunteers. At the close of the war I returned to Fort Wayne as colonel of that regiment, entered the office of Judge Ninde (Ninde & Taylor) to read law. In the summer of 1866, at the solicitation of Judge Ninde, I left his office to take a law course at Harvard University, at Cambridge, Mass. I was a student at that institution when I received an appointment in the Regular Army, which I accepted.

As I was appointed to the Army from the State of Indiana, and as I was at the time a citizen and resident of Fort Wayne, my military service should not affect my residence or citizenship, and I still remain a resident of Fort Wayne and a citizen of that State. I have a letter before me from G. W. Boerger, secretary of Harmony Lodge, No. 19, I. O. O. F., dated Fort Wayne, Ind., February 24, 1899, in which the following occurs:

"I have a book before me in which you signed the constitution on the night of your initiation, and it reads, 'H. W. Lawton; residence, Fort Wayne, Ind.; age, 21; occupation, soldier; date, March 24, 1864.' This makes you the oldest living member," etc.

So, you will observe, I was a citizen of Fort Wayne at the time of reaching my majority. The Army Register shows me as appointed from Indiana, and there is on file in the Adjutant-General's Office various statements made by myself at different times, whenever my grade in the Army had to be changed, each of which reads, "Residence, Fort Wayne, Ind." I am also, as you know, a member of Sion S. Bass Post, G. A. R., and I am also a member of Summit City Lodge, F. and A. M., having joined that fraternity, I believe, the same year that I joined Harmony Lodge of Odd Fellows, to wit, 1864.

I have never wavered in my allegiance to the State of Indiana and have never for a moment contemplated a change of residence. Fort Wayne, Ind., is the only place where I could legally cast a vote or where I could have voted at any time since I attained my majority.

I was married to Mary Craig, near Louisville, Ky., in 1881; we have four children, one boy and three girls, all in good health and doing finely. I think you will find my name in a book giving a history of Allen County. I think this gives you all the information you desire and answers all your questions.

I take great interest in the reunions of our old regiments and keep posted as well as I can concerning my old comrades. I have, therefore, heard of the death of many of them, and feel often that the time is close at hand when I, too, must join the great majority as they go marching along.

Sincerely and fraternally, yours,

H. W. LAWTON,
Major-General, United States Volunteers.

A. S. COVELL, Fort Wayne, Ind.

Those who knew him at Fort Wayne in his boyhood spoke of his great interest and enthusiasm in all things military, and which presaged his future success in his chosen walk of life.

On the 18th of April, 1861, three days after President Lincoln's first call for volunteers in the war for the Union, at the age of 18, he enlisted as a private in the Ninth Indiana Volunteers.

He was discharged July 29, 1861. On September 24, 1861, he became first lieutenant of the Thirtieth Indiana Volunteers. He was made a captain May 17, 1862. February 10, 1865, he was made a lieutenant-colonel. He was brevetted colonel of volunteers March 13, 1865. He served with his regiment in the field in the Army of the Tennessee throughout that war, and at its close was mustered out, at the age of 22, as lieutenant-colonel, after being brevetted colonel for gallant and meritorious service and awarded a medal of honor for distinguished gallantry.

He was mustered out of the Volunteer Army November 25, 1865. He was commissioned second lieutenant in the Regular Army on the 28th of July, 1866, and served in the infantry until 1869, then in the cavalry until 1888, and thereafter as inspector-general until the commencement of the war with Spain.

Upon the declaration of war with Spain he was made brigadier-general of volunteers, and on the 8th of July following major-general of volunteers. His nomination for brigadier-general of the Regular Army was determined upon and was ready to be sent to the Senate upon the day of his death. He commanded the Second Division of the Fifth Army Corps in the Cuban campaign, rendering distinguished service in the battles before Santiago, and subsequently commanded the Department of Santiago and the Fourth Army Corps. On the 18th of March, 1899, he assumed command of the First Division of the Eighth Army Corps in the Philippine Islands and remained in command of this division in a practically continuous and most eventful service till he fell in battle on the 18th of December, 1899. He was a member of several Fort Wayne lodges—of Sion S. Bass Post, Grand Army of the Republic; of Harmony Lodge, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, No. 19, which conferred upon him a short time before his death a medal of honor as a quarter-of-a-century member; and of Summit City Lodge, Free and Accepted Masons.

The nation which he served so long mourns the death of this distinguished soldier, and Indianians feel it as a personal loss. Fort Wayne, the place of his first enlistment, and the city which during his entire military service he cherished as his home, sincerely mourns his loss, and its citizens met together in a convention of sorrow in December, 1899, with many of his old soldier friends and brothers in affiliated orders, and voiced their sentiments in appropriate resolutions.

As a member of his lodge, as a son of one who fought with him in the Thirtieth Indiana, as a member of the American Congress, I esteem it a special privilege and honor that the Speaker and the members here assembled turned from important public work to hear this tribute to Indiana's hero.

No truer sentiment can be spoken of General Lawton, no better tribute can be paid him, than to say he lived and died in the esteem of all his countrymen. The hearts of the volunteers were ever with him in his struggle up the obstructed stream of promotion in the Army, made difficult by his not receiving a military college education. He was their idol, and his heart was ever with the volunteers till it ceased to beat on the field of battle. No man was ever more popular with the volunteer soldiers than Maj. Gen. Henry W. Lawton. [Applause.]

CONTESTED ELECTION—EVANS VS. TURNER, FIFTH DISTRICT, KENTUCKY.

Mr. LINNEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a privileged report from the Committee on Elections No. 1.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina submits the following privileged report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Walter Evans was not elected a member of the Fifty-sixth Congress of the United States from the Fifth Congressional district of Kentucky and is not entitled to a seat therein.

Resolved, That Oscar Turner was elected a member of the Fifty-sixth Congress from the Fifth Congressional district of the State of Kentucky and is entitled to a seat in the Fifty-sixth Congress.

Mr. LINNEY. Mr. Speaker, as I am informed there is to be no minority report, I ask for the immediate consideration of the resolutions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves that the report of the committee be agreed to.

The resolutions were agreed to.

On motion of Mr. LINNEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CONTESTED ELECTION—PEARSON VS. CRAWFORD, NINTH DISTRICT, NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. ROBERTS, from Committee on Elections No. 3, presented the report of the committee in the contested-election case of Pearson vs. Crawford, Ninth district, North Carolina, stating that it was agreed to in the committee that the minority should be given ten days in which to present their views.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, ten days will be allowed the minority in which to present their views.

There was no objection.

The report was ordered to be printed and referred to the House Calendar.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

And then, on motion of Mr. HITT, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7941) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, with Mr. SHERMAN in the chair.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, I move to dispense with the first formal reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks to dispense with the first formal reading of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HITT. Now, Mr. Chairman, before proceeding further, I should like to make some agreement with the gentleman representing the minority of the committee as to the time desired for general debate.

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT], the chairman of the committee, that I have had applications from a number of gentlemen who desire to speak. Several gentlemen on the committee desire to be heard, and one or two others have asked for an opportunity to address the House on this bill. So I suggest to the gentleman that we let this day be devoted to discussion of the bill under general debate, without placing any other limitation upon it.

Mr. HITT. I think, Mr. Chairman, with such an arrangement, the practical result would be to give the time substantially to the minority, and only a small part of it will be asked for by the majority, as far as I am advised, and I will make that agreement on behalf of my colleagues, that we close the general debate to-day. The committee can rise when general debate is closed, and we will proceed to read the bill by paragraphs to-morrow.

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Chairman, that was not my proposition to the gentleman. I suggested that we place no limitation as yet upon the general debate; that we agree only to devote this day to general debate and leave it until to-morrow morning to determine what limitation shall be placed upon it. I hope we shall be able to get through with it to-day, but I am doubtful about it, if anybody speaks upon the other side, because of the applications to speak on this side. I would rather have a more liberal allowance than that. I am sure there is plenty of time.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. HITT. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Colorado for such remarks as he desires.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, I understand from the ranking member on this side of the House that he has received applications from members of the committee that will consume all of the time that will be allotted to him on this side. I will state that I should like to talk——

Mr. HITT. I will supplement his statement by saying that I will give him some additional time which belongs to our side of the House, which we do not expect to consume.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state, Mr. Chairman, that it seems to me that the proposition of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE] is fair, and that debate ought to be extended in this matter, at least for a reasonable time. I should like to have some time myself to finish a talk that I started here the other day. If that time is given, why, of course, it will be satisfactory to me that we finish to-day, if no other member desires to occupy more time.

Mr. DINSMORE. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that it is unusual to allow such a short time as this. There is no demand now on the time of the House. We have been meeting and adjourning and transacting very little business, and I think if gentlemen desire to be heard they ought to be indulged.

Mr. HITT. What would the gentleman say to 2 o'clock to-morrow as the time at which to close general debate?

Mr. DINSMORE. I would rather leave it open entirely.

Mr. HITT. We can settle that at any time. I will assent to the gentleman's proposition that to-day be devoted to general debate.

Mr. DINSMORE. Leave it until to-morrow to determine at what hour debate shall close.

Mr. HITT. And the committee will rise when it sees fit.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that no arrangement has been made.

Mr. HITT. There is an arrangement as to general debate—that it shall continue and consume this day, and that no vote shall be taken to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. That is simply a statement of the gentleman, and it has not been put to the committee as the request of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HITT. I request, then, that general debate only be in order for to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that general debate alone be in order for to-day upon this appropriation bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HITT. The time will be controlled, I suppose, according to usage.

The CHAIRMAN. Without some arrangement, that would not be so.

Mr. HITT. The gentleman from Arkansas can suggest an arrangement.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the time may be equally divided between the two sides of the committee, to be controlled on the one side by the gentleman from Illinois and on the other by the gentleman from Arkansas. Is there objection to that request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, before general debate begins, which will not have much to do with the bill, I will say a word about the measure itself as it is before the House. It appropriates the money to support the consular and diplomatic service of the United States for the next fiscal year. The amount is $1,743,408.76, or $31,875 more than we appropriated last year, and some $152,440 less than the estimates of the Department. I will say to gentlemen to whom the bill may not be familiar, that this apparent appropriation is far greater than the real burden to the Treasury and to the taxpayer.

Half of the amount that is appropriated is paid into the service by the officers of the Government. Over $900,000 was paid into the Treasury by the consuls. Many of the other items that are in this bill which seem very large are in their nature contingent, and are rarely if ever all expended, sometimes not one-fifth; but it is always deemed prudent to make these appropriations for apparently considerable sums of expenditure. Some of them are not nearly all expended and some, as, for instance, expenses on extradition cases, is all reimbursed by the foreign governments; so that the sum to be taxed upon the people and drawn from the Treasury is far less than the amount stated in the face of the bill.

The bill is substantially a repetition of existing legislation. By the rules of the House the committee is forbidden to make changes in existing law, and we have only made changes in those items which are of such elastic nature that they can be considered as subject under the rules to change in amount. Though the expenditure is for an object authorized by existing law, some salary appropriations have increased apparently, because a number of officers are in this bill for the first time paid by fixed salaries, where they have heretofore been paid by fees. They now appear for the first time upon this bill as increases apparently.

Such offices are at Aden, on the Red Sea; at Chihuahua, Mexico; Ensenada, Mexico. The difference between the amount paid heretofore as fees and the amount of the salary now given is so inconsiderable that it is hardly perceptible. At Aden, where the fees now amount to $1,479, the salary is fixed at $1,500. At Chihuahua the fees were $1,430, and that is made a salaried consulate at $1,500. It is desirable always that the compensation of the officers of the Government should be fixed and the various sums stated plainly in the law. For the information of the House I have stated these changes.

There is some increase in the amount allowed for contingent expenses of foreign missions, namely, $20,000, but really an increase of $17,000 appropriated, as $5,000 for the inspection of diplomatic and consular offices, heretofore a separate item, is put in the category of contingent expenses for foreign missions, and it will be paid out of this contingent fund. For the Mexican Boundary Commission $20,000 is appropriated. When the matter was before the committee they first cut it down $5,000, but at the last moment, on a statement from the Secretary of State that it was needed immediately for the Government's pressing wants, it was put at $20,000.

There were a large number of recommendations by the Department which we could not under the rules accede to, increasing the salaries paid to consuls at many points where they are too low, and also in the allowances for clerk hire. We have taken one, where the highest amount of labor is done in the transaction of business, at London, where the consul-general himself has to pay for additional hire. We have taken and added the sum paid by him and made the allowance.

The bill, gentlemen, is a good bill. It was reported by the committee unanimously. I think it is inadequate provision for a service which itself is inadequate and ought to be increased and improved. I would have been glad to make better provision for a service that is increasing in its duties every year and a service that has proven more and more valuable every year to the great commercial interest, especially in promoting the enormous and rapidly increasing exportations of our manufactured goods everywhere.

In that work these men are our agents, furnishing information, promoting trade. They are a kind of propaganda all over the world for the sale of our products that are now invading every market. Their compensation and number ought to be increased, as they are increasing in their efficiency. I will now yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE].

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Chairman, as has been stated by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the bill which has been reported from that committee has but few changes from the law of appropriations of last year for the diplomatic and consular service, and those changes are such as were suggested and demanded by changed conditions since the former law was enacted. Therefore, there is no necessity for any discussion of the measure in itself. It has been reported to the House unanimously from the committee. But, sir, I desire to avail myself of this opportunity to submit a few observations upon the general conditions in the country in relation to foreign affairs and in relation to our Government's action toward its recently acquired possessions or those which it is now struggling to acquire.

I will read, in the first place, Mr. Chairman, from the President's annual message sent to Congress at the beginning of the present session, in which we find this language:

> The withdrawal of the authority of Spain from the island of Cuba was effected by the 1st of January, so that the full reestablishment of peace found the relinquished territory held by us in trust for the inhabitants, maintaining, under the direction of the Executive, such government and control therein as should conserve public order, restore the productive conditions of peace so long disturbed by the instability and disorder which prevailed for the greater part of the preceding three decades, and build up that tranquil development of the domestic state whereby alone can be realized the high purpose, as proclaimed in the joint resolution adopted by the Congress on the 19th of April, 1898, by which the United States disclaimed any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over Cuba, except for the pacification thereof, and asserted its determination when that was accomplished to leave the government and control of the island to its people. The pledge contained in this resolution is of the highest honorable obligation and must be sacredly kept.

So said the President of the United States, and when he used this language I believe that he earnestly felt what he uttered, that it was his purpose, so far as he was able as the Chief Executive, to see that the faith pledged in the resolution of Congress that he recites should be kept by this Government. In connection with this message, I want to call the attention of the House to one or two incidents. Just after it was sent to Congress by the President the Committee on Rules, which has complete control of procedure in the House, reported a resolution creating a new committee to take jurisdiction of certain legislative matters.

That committee was styled, is styled, the Committee on Insular Affairs. It was supposedly created to take jurisdiction of matters appertaining to the undisputed territory of the United States. Prior to the creation of this committee the Committee on Foreign Affairs had jurisdiction of all things appertaining to the relations between the United States and Cuba. Presumably it was not done because of any doubt of the ability of the Foreign Affairs Committee to continue successfully to manage that business.

The resolution, before it was referred to the Committee on Rules and reported back, did not provide for the transfer of that jurisdiction to the Committee on Insular Affairs; but the Committee on Rules, for some reason best known to its members, provided by the resolution that the jurisdiction should be taken away from the Committee on Foreign Affairs. What was it, Mr. Chairman? What motive impelled them to that action? The Committee on Rules does not act without some purpose. The resolution as introduced in the House, before it was reported back by the Committee on Rules, did not provide for the transfer of the jurisdiction.

Why, I ask again, did they see proper to make such a transfer to the new committee from the Committee on Foreign Affairs? The new committee has its hands full of the business relative to other matters, and the Committee on Foreign Affairs is left with practically, at this time, nothing to do. I am glad that, since the Committee on Foreign Affairs is relieved of the business and it has gone to the Committee on Insular Affairs, a committee very able in its personnel, that our very able chairman [Mr. HITT] was made a member also of the new committee. I am not especially jealous of the fact that the jurisdiction has been taken away from the Committe on Foreign Affairs, but I deplore the fact that this action on the part of the Committee on Rules has an appearance of a purpose not to carry out the will of the President as expressed in his message, but to give color to a pretension which may be later boldly asserted, that we have rights in the island of Cuba beyond the pledge of Congress, and, in violation of it, that there is an ultimate purpose to destroy the liberties which our men fought for at Santiago and achieved for the Cubans. I do not impute to any particular person bad motives.

I do not say that men act dishonestly; I believe there is not a gentleman in this House who, if confronted with the proposition contained in the President's language with reference to Cuba, would not assert that that is the purpose of Congress. He would resent indignantly any imputation that he had any other purpose, but at the same time it is in the atmosphere and we hear it on all hands that other things will happen; doubts are expressed, not only by the ordinary individual in the common walks of life, but by men of official character, although not making the statement officially, as to whether the United States Government will ever relinquish its hold on the island of Cuba.

Why all this talk, Mr. Chairman, about who shall haul down the flag? It is as applicable to Cuba as it is to the Philippines. Who shall haul it down, they say, where once its folds have sheltered any territory? It must be left and never pulled down. I myself have heard from individuals the assertion that we never will abandon Cuba. We are told that we dare not leave the Philippines to themselves; that they are incapable of self-government. Are they more so than the Cubans? Admiral Dewey has told us they are less so.

Now, let us consider the conditions in Cuba and in the Philippines at the outbreak of the war and compare them with each other.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. DINSMORE. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. I should be glad if the gentleman from Arkansas, in this connection, would state whether he would be in favor of the annexation of Cuba if the people of Cuba so voted.

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Chairman, I say to the gentleman that I have for a long time, as a citizen of this country, felt a desire that at some time we should possess the island of Cuba; and if at any time I recognized that there had been a full, free, fair, untrammeled expression of a desire on the part of the Cuban people themselves to be admitted into this Union, they coming in with a proper form of government to entitle them to admission, and their people were prepared for it, I would favor it. I will say furthermore to my friend that never would I favor any such method as that adopted when the Hawaiian Islands were annexed, when the people of those islands were not consulted—nobody, practically, except a lot of missionaries, traders, and commercial adventurers.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. I referred simply to a full and complete vote on the part of the people of Cuba, asking for admission.

Mr. DINSMORE. Well, I have answered the gentleman as definitely as I could and, I hope, to his satisfaction. I do not want to be drawn beyond the limits which I have set for myself in this discussion and which I propose to follow in a general and brief way.

But if the flag can not be pulled down in the Philippines because the honor of the nation is involved, and so it is said; if we have pledged to civilization anything in behalf of the inhabitants of the Philippines, is it not fully so with regard to the Cubans? There is at least this to be said: With reference to Cuba, we defined what honor demands, in the name of liberty, by Congressional action. Yet it seems, according to the President, that honor demands one thing in Cuba and another in the Philippines. Admiral Dewey has told us that the Filipinos are more capable of self-government than the Cubans. He has said that he is familiar with the two peoples and that in his view the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands are more capable of self-government than the Cubans. Is not liberty as dear to one as to the other?

Mr. Chairman, the Cubans and the Filipinos have suffered under the same cruel oppression and tyranny of the same despotic power. When we went to their relief the people of Cuba were in insurrection against that tyranny and so were the Filipinos, each having organized armies, the army of the Filipinos the larger one and more capable and better armed than that of Cuba, both struggling for liberty with the same cause, the same justification exactly, though their interests and revolutionary actions were not mutual.

When Cuba, which is nearer to our own borders, sent up her cries of distress, drawn forth by Spanish persecutions, which were unheeded, the people of the United States, after patient and earnest protests, demanded that action should be taken on the part of this Government in their behalf.

Why? For the purpose of territorial acquisition? Not at all; that we specifically disavowed; but because the condition of suffering, distress, and oppression in Cuba appealed to the sympathy of the most liberty-loving people on earth, a people who have established for themselves a government under which liberty abounds and whose people desire to see it enjoyed by all who aspire to independence and freedom. By a solemn resolution of Congress we declared that they were and of right ought to be free and independent; we invoked the power of this great Government to make them so; and for fear of that spirit of greed which dwells in the minds of men grasping after money, we provided in that resolution that it was not the purpose of the United States to carry on a war of conquest or to exercise any dominion or control in the island of Cuba, but to give those people freedom and then to withdraw our forces.

The country is familiar with conditions existing in Cuba at the outbreak of hostilities, and the official correspondence of our consular officers on file in the State Department, published with other important correspondence, which I shall allude to hereafter, in Senate Document 62, has informed us equally well the state of affairs in the Philippines. The conditions were exactly similar. Consul Williams, writing from Manila to the State Department on February 22, 1898, said:

> Peace was proclaimed. * * * but there is no peace and has been none for about two years. Conditions here and in Cuba are practically alike. War exists, battles are of almost daily occurrence, and ambulances bring in many wounded, and hospitals are full. Prisoners are brought here and shot without trial, and Manila is under martial law.

Writing again, March 19, 1898, Mr. Williams said:

> Insurrection is rampant; many killed, wounded, and made prisoners on both sides. A battle ship, the Don Juan de Austria, sent this week to the northern part of Luzon to cooperate with a land force of 2,000, dispatched to succor local forces, overwhelmed by rebels.
>
> * * * * * * *
> Rebellion never more threatening to Spain. Rebels getting arms, money and friends, and they outnumber the Spaniards, resident and soldiery, probably a hundred to one.

In his letter of March 27, Mr. Williams said:

> Cuban conditions exist here possibly in aggravated form. Spanish soldiers are killed and wounded daily, despite claimed pacification, and the hospitals are kept full.

When our forces are to be withdrawn I can not say; no other gentleman can say; but I hope it may be early. Yet I have grave fears that it will be never, notwithstanding the President's message, saying our "pledge is of the highest honorable obligation and must be sacredly kept." We know his and his party's purpose in the Philippines, and we doubt. People who will not recognize a moral obligation because it is not evidenced by a sealed contract may easily find a way to break the terms of a written bond, especially so when the reasons assigned for the justification of the one are, if true at all, which I deny, equally applicable to the other. What great differences exist that we are impelled on the one hand to act in the name of liberty and on the other for the purpose of oppression and in denial of freedom?

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. If the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. DINSMORE. Certainly. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. I do not desire to interrupt the thread of my friend's argument, but his views are always interesting to me, and I would like him before he concludes his remarks to elaborate an affirmative proposition as to what, in his judgment, would be a proper solution of the Philippine problem.

Mr. DINSMORE. I shall be very glad to do so, and I do not know that there will be a better opportunity than the present, because I have no prepared speech to deliver.

Let us take a retrospect for only a moment. If there are any embarrassments or difficulties presented to us to-day in withdrawing our forces from those islands or in taking a position which does not look to ultimate and permanent sovereignty, that condition is due to the fault of ourselves, and not to the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands.

But whatever the embarrassment may be to-day, I say, without hesitation so far as I am concerned, that in respect to every tradition of this Government, with respect to our Constitution, with respect to the Declaration of Independence, which breathes a holy assertion of the principles of liberty and the rights of all men to participate in their own government and control, in view of our own interests, commercial and industrial, this Government should officially say now—we having failed to say it formerly, as we should have done—to those people who are in arms against the United States: "It is not our purpose to acquire permanent sovereignty over you. It is not our purpose to hold you in subjection and to force upon you a government to which you yourselves have objected. We will not do so. We offer to you our friendly assistance to restore peace and order and to establish a government of your own."

That is what they expected of us in the beginning; and if that proposition had been made to them at any time during the progress of this war, it is my belief that they would have come to terms and laid down their arms, and there would have been a cessation of hostilities. And having done this, I would make a treaty with that government on the part of the United States and withdraw from it and no longer be responsible for it otherwise than as provided for in that treaty. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

That is easy of accomplishment. Why not? What peculiar obligations rest upon us that will prevent us from doing that?

There are two arguments used, two reasons assigned on the part of the annexationists. The one is in the name of civilization and alleged humanitarianism, the other in the name of trade and commerce. These two alone.

The speeches we hear are not arguments directed to reason; they are appeals to sentiment, to the hearts of the people, their love for the flag, and they charge us with interfering with the progress of American arms, and we have been branded in the yellow journals, and even by men in high official station, as "traitors" and "copperheads."

Mr. Chairman, the flag is a prolific theme. The mere mention of the flag of our country stirs the hearts of all Americans. When an appeal is made in its name by the sophist, it reaches the unreflecting and carries them away at times. Who does not love the flag! We love it because it is the emblem of liberty; because it is the ensign under which this great country has grown in prosperity and wealth and happiness and power; because it stands for the liberty of the individual citizen and for the right of the people to govern themselves, and never, until this new era of dishonor, has it ever been emblematic of anything else.

"Who will haul it down?" I should say that a President of the United States, loving that flag for itself and every association, loving it because it means the best things that have ever been accomplished in this country—and if the simple principles of our Constitution and our system of government are adhered to, as in the past, it means more and greater growth in happiness and material prosperity—that that President, unwilling that the flag should stand for anything other than is consistent with our professions in the past, our life as a nation and a people, should, by his own order, have it taken down where it means the subjugation of any people on earth against their own will. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] the other day made a very happy and eloquent speech as an annexationist. I listened to him with a great deal of pleasure. I always do. I have for him the kindliest feeling of affection, and my admiration of his speech on that occasion was not in the least disparaged by the fact that I knew he could make just as eloquent a speech and a much stronger one upon the other side of the question, and probably will before he is two years older. I am justified in making that statement by the fact that I have heard him make very able speeches on two sides of a question quite as important as this since I have been in Congress.

He glorifies the flag. He says that he is an optimist, and I truly think he is, in the superlative degree. I can not, like him, plant myself on hope alone, and without reference to practical conditions, in disregard of the operation of legal and constitutional restraints, forgetting our best and holiest traditions, bidding defiance to the things that have wrecked governments in other lands and other ages, declare my belief "that on this continent God has willed to plant a people who shall carry the arts of peace and the story of the cross to the nations of the earth" and at the same time offer the sword and the bayonet as the instruments of that achievement. God hath said, "They that live by the sword shall perish by the sword."

My friend used this language with reference to Rome, which I recall, and quote from the RECORD:

Mr. Speaker, we have held up to us for warning the history of Persia and Greece, of Babylon and Rome. They have flourished and have faded. They had their morning hour and their meridian and went out in the blackness of night. Rome expanded until, like a wheel, the spokes radiated from the hub throughout Europe, Asia, and Africa. The collapse of her power and of every empire of the past came not from the weakness of the periphery of the wheel, but from the rottenness of the hub.

Mr. Chairman, that is exactly what we, of conservative position upon this question, desire to prevent for our own country—the rotting of the hub. The gentleman is correct, but when the periphery was extended to such remote bounds, when so many spokes were crowded into the hub, when an enormous military establishment became necessary to keep in subjection and order all this wide domain over which Rome exercised control, then it was that the possibility arose for corruptions to begin at the center of government and the hub became strained and split and cracked and rotten, and the whole Empire came tumbling down, a mighty heap of ruin upon the heads of people who had enjoyed liberty before.

We would pursue a conservative, safe course in this country. We desire to refrain from expanding our dominion away out into the islands of the sea, because we believe it is dangerous; because we believe the creation of great standing armies is not only expensive and a drain upon the substance of the people, but that it imperils their liberties; because we believe that it tempts the jealousy of other nations and makes us a party to the contest going on in the great Orient for the possession of territory when we do not need it for our own uses.

I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, in the theory of commerce by military establishment. I believe that commerce follows peace. I do not believe in the trade of the bayonet; I believe in the trade of the pen and countinghouse. I do not believe in the trade of the man-of-war with bristling cannon; I believe in the trade of the ship that flies under the white sails of peace and friendship and thrift and competition, bearing our commerce to every clime and offering it to the world upon terms which are reciprocally beneficial to it and to us. This is the true theory of commerce, and no other can be justified. By it we maintain peace and friendly relations with all the world. By the other we constantly hazard the liberty of the people and endanger our Government to disturbances and embarrassments with foreign powers.

But, Mr. Chairman, I ask the House to reflect a moment upon the theory of commerce as a justification of the Administration's policy. If this war is being waged for money, that there shall be additional trade established for the benefit of those who sell and buy in this country, what is the price that we pay? It is not only the millions of dollars that go out from the Treasury to maintain permanent armies; it is not only the millions of dollars that will be necessary in the future to maintain colonies under military rule; not that alone; we are paying for it in the precious blood of our land. Who shall adjudge the value of an American soldier's life? Who shall place it in the scale with trade and dollars and material wealth?

Who shall say how many lives we will be justified in expending for the establishment of the trade which gentlemen value so highly? The soldier must do his duty. His duty is to obey orders, and the President is his officer of supreme command. No matter what the danger, what the cause. Soldiers know nothing of causes. When ordered to fight the Filipino, could they refuse?

Not tho' the soldier knew
Some one had blundered:
Theirs not to make reply,
Theirs not to reason why,
Theirs but to do and die.

Ah, Mr. Chairman, the blunders of this Administration have accomplished a fearful harvest of death. The Washington Post two days ago gave this telegram from San Francisco:

REMAINS OF 800 AMERICAN SOLDIERS.

SAN FRANCISCO, February 2, 1899.

A cable from Manila was received from the quartermaster's department stating that the Hancock sailed for San Francisco on January 19 with the bodies of 462 dead soldiers. The Indiana is expected in immediately with 200 bodies, and the Ohio, with 138, arrived to-day.

Over 800 dead soldiers brought back to their native land. Dead, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen. Dead, Mr. President and Messrs. Commissioners. Dead, as a logical, inevitable result of your blundering, grasping policy. Sacrifices offered up by this Administration in the name of trade, in the cause of greed, in the cause of a false and hypocritical philanthropy. I protest against it. Even this morning the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] arose to announce that the gallant General Lawton to-day lies in his native city in state, with his comrades and his friends weeping about him.

That great life was given as a sacrifice, an enforced sacrifice, by this Administration to establish domination in the Philippine Islands. By what right are these 800 lives sacrificed? And there have been many more and there will be yet more. These boys who went away a few months ago under orders, and bearing upon their lips the parting kiss of sweetheart, sister, wife, and mother, followed across the seas by prayers of loved ones at home, are now returning cold and dead, bringing a pall of gloom into thousands of homes. Ten thousand weepers and mourners will stand about them, and pour out tears before the broken forms of those that "sleep the sleep that knows no waking." And may I be permitted to ask of the President, of every Republican in the country, and of my good friend from Pennsylvania, how many more American lives they feel justified in sacrificing, how many more homes shall be made desolate, in the name of trade and "mercy?"

That is the price that is being paid for the domination of the United States in the Philippines; that is the sacrifice that is being exacted by the President. Is it with the consent of the people? Was it done with the consent of Congress? Congress was not consulted in regard to the action to be taken in the Philippines. This calamitous condition was brought upon us by the action of the Administration, by the Executive and his officers.

He sent his commission to Paris to effect a treaty of peace. There was but one thing that stood as an obstruction to the speedy accomplishment of that purpose. They demanded cession of the Philippines. Under instructions, the American commissioners held the knife at the throat of a prostrate, beaten antagonist, and holding out $20,000,000 as a bribe, added to intimidation, induced him to yield a reluctant consent; $20,000,000 were given as consideration for the privilege or as a pretext to crush the Filipinos and force them into subjection to this Government against their will; $20,000,000 were paid for an excuse to sacrifice thousands of lives of Americans and islanders in the name of God and trade; and gentlemen call this "carrying the arts of peace and the story of the Cross to the nations of the earth."

How does this appear to you? What kind of sentiment does it engender, what feeling inspire, in view of all that was said and done in the cause of liberty for Cuba? Now, "honor" demands that we must wage cruel war against the Filipinos to force them to submit to that which under the dictates of honor we freed the Cubans of. So it runs all through, the same character of dissimulation and false pretense, for I must call it that; and they insist that we are now committed to it forever by the action of the Filipinos themselves, which is but adding one degree more of hypocrisy.

Mr. Chairman, when we have cited them to the fact that we gave the Filipinos cause to believe that we would assist them to independence, and that we sought and had their cooperation in fighting the Spaniards, that by their aid the Spaniard was crushed in Luzon, they say there was no cooperation. There was a practical alliance between our forces and Aguinaldo; but this, too, is denied.

A commission appointed by the President, in their "preliminary report," which was filed and referred to Congress by the President with his message, says there never was any cooperation. While battling for the liberty of the people in Cuba when we asserted the sovereign right of all men to control their own destinies, or at least participate in that control, it became necessary to strike the enemy in the Orient.

He had a fleet in Manila Bay. He had garrisons in the Philippine Islands. All are familiar with our wonderful victory in Manila Bay. But while Dewey held the bay Aguinaldo and his patriot army pressed the land forces of the enemy to the very verge of the sea and could have taken the city of Manila any day. There was no cooperation say the commission. How came Aguinaldo there? Go to the official reports of our own officers and ascertain. United States Consul-General Pratt at Singapore held frequent interviews with Aguinaldo before the battle of Manila, and through him communication was had between Dewey and Aguinaldo, which led to the latter's accepting passage on a United States ship of war and going to Manila and taking command of the insurgent army by the assistance and advice of Admiral Dewey, who furnished him with arms.

Before Admiral Dewey left Hongkong for Manila Consul-General Pratt wired him from Singapore that Aguinaldo was willing to join him "for general cooperation, if desired." Those were the words. What was Dewey's answer? "Tell Aguinaldo come soon as possible." Aguinaldo arrived at Hongkong too late to go with Dewey, but so important was his presence and cooperation esteemed that by Dewey's orders he was taken on board the McCulloch and conveyed to Manila. What further evidence is there of cooperation? On July 4 Gen. Thomas Anderson, commanding the United States land forces, wrote to Aguinaldo, having been placed by Dewey at the head of the insurgent army, as follows:

General, I have the honor to inform you that the United States of America, whose land forces I have the honor to command in this vicinity, being at war with the Kingdom of Spain, has entire sympathy and most friendly sentiments for the native people of the Philippine Islands. For these reasons I desire to have the most amicable relations with you, and to have you and your people cooperate with us in military operations against the Spanish forces, etc.

Now, this same commission tells you that not until long after that, until after the Spaniards had been crushed, did Aguinaldo or his followers ever express a desire for independence. But here Admiral Dewey tells you in this dispatch to the Department, dated June 27, that he has gone to attend a meeting of the insurgent leaders for the purpose of forming a civil government.

DEWEY'S DISPATCH.

HONGKONG, June 27, 1898.

SECRETARY OF NAVY, Washington:

Receipt of telegram of June 14 is acknowledged. Aguinaldo, insurgent leader, with 13 of his staff, arrived May 19, by permission, on Nanshan. Established self Cavite, outside arsenal, under the protection of our guns, and organized his army. I have had several conferences with him, generally of a personal nature. Consistently I have refrained from assisting him in any way with the force under my command, and on several occasions I have declined requests that I should do so, telling him the squadron could not act until the arrival of the United States troops. At the same time I have given him to understand that I consider insurgents as friends, being opposed to a common enemy. He has gone to attend a meeting of insurgent leaders for the purpose of forming a civil government. Aguinaldo has acted independently of the squadron, but has kept me advised of his progress, which has been wonderful. I have allowed to pass by water recruits, arms, and ammunition, and to take such Spanish arms and ammunition from the arsenal as he needed. Have advised frequently to conduct the war humanely, which he has done invariably. * * * In my opinion, these people are far superior in their intelligence and more capable of self-government than the natives of Cuba, and I am familiar with both races.

DEWEY.

Is this cooperation? He says that he furnished him the means to get arms for his people. That he acted independently it is true, but under the advice of Dewey, and Dewey commends him for the manner in which he is discharging the duty which is expected of him by Dewey and the military commanders that he shall perform.

"They did not expect independence." Why, Mr. Chairman, one of the most pathetic things in the history of all the transactions, in view of what is now said and the contention of people in Congress and of the Administration, is contained in a proclamation of joy which the insurgent representatives in Hongkong sent to the people in the Philippine Islands after the conference with Pratt, after Dewey had gone to Manila to strike the Spaniards. Here it is—a part of it—of the proclamation to the Filipinos from their leaders, the Filipino junta, in Hongkong:

Compatriots, Divine Providence is about to place independence within our reach. The Americans, not from any mercenary motives, but for the sake of humanity, have considered it opportune to extend their protecting mantle to our beloved country. Where you see the American flag flying, assemble in mass. They are our redeemers.

Does that read as if they hoped for independence? But that is not the only significance of this dispatch. Mr. Rounseville Wildman, United States consul at Hongkong, had advised with Aguinaldo throughout, and says himself that he (Wildman) outlined the proclamation Aguinaldo issued to his people. This is his language:

Immediately on the arrival of Aguinaldo at Cavite he issued a proclamation, which I had outlined for him before he left, forbidding pillage and making it a criminal offense to maltreat neutrals. He, of course, organized a government of which he was dictator, an absolutely necessary step if he hoped to maintain control over the natives, and from that date until the present time he has been uninterruptedly successful in the field and dignified and just as the head of his government. According to his own statements to me by letter, he has been approached by both the Spaniards and the Germans, and has had tempting offers made him by the Catholic Church. He has been watched very closely by Admiral Dewey, Consul Williams, and his own junta here in Hongkong, and nothing of moment has occurred which would lead anyone to believe that he was not carrying out to the letter the promises made to me in this consulate.

Here is proof both of abundant cooperation and of the hope and expectation of the Filipinos from the first for independence.

Does it appear that they wanted independence? Were they justified in sending their proclamation from Hongkong? They were justified in every view; by the position we had taken with reference to Cuba, by the solemn promise of the Congress of the United States in reference to Cuba, because they were exactly in the condition that we found the Cubans. They wanted us to assist them to independence and then withdraw.

Does anybody believe any Filipino insurgent or leader thought that our people had any other purpose than that? Does any member believe that Admiral Dewey ever expected anything else to occur? Do you believe that Otis, or any other general in command of the land forces, expected anything else? To have taken a position at the time these difficulties first occurred that we would pursue any other course than that which we pursued toward Cuba would have been an insult to the dignity and fair name of the United States Government. The Administration contends that the Filipinos opened hostilities against us.

To say so is not true. We began them ourselves. We firedt he first shot. A soldier from a Kansas regiment fired upon a Filipino patrol between the lines of the American and insurgent forces. The fire was returned, and a number of the native soldiers were killed. Aguinaldo immediately expressed to General Otis his regret at the occurrence, distinctly disavowed any purpose of hostility, and offered to move his lines back as far as the American commander desired. Honor between men, honor between nations, honor in every sense demanded that this proposal should have been recognized in the interest of peace. But it was not. General Otis made the cruel reply that since the fighting had commenced, it must go on to the bitter end. That end is not yet reached, and Otis is responsible.

Let us look a little further. These things are being done in the name of "benevolent assimilation" and other high-sounding phrases.

The President of the United States appointed his commission and sent them out to the Philippine Islands. That commission reports that the people of the Philippine Islands never dreamed of independence till after the Spaniards had been crushed and we had taken possession of Manila. The records tell you differently. The Singapore Press, reciting interviews between our officials and Aguinaldo, their correctness vouched for by United States Consul-General Pratt, controvert the statement. The proclamation of the Philippine representatives, made public to the world, tell you differently. The very struggle of those people striving for liberty itself gives the lie to the commission's statement.

After the Spaniards had capitulated, but before the treaty was concluded, the President issued a proclamation and sent it over to be promulgated by General Otis. General Otis took a very extraordinary liberty with that proclamation—a liberty which he was justified in taking in the cause of fairness and honesty, and for the purpose of preserving the good name of our country. Whether that was his motive must be ascertained by all that he said and did taken together, but it might well have been. That he did so is not denied. He himself reports the manner in which it was done. What does he say? General Otis reports—

After fully considering the President's proclamation and the temper of the Tagalos, with whom I was daily discussing political problems and the friendly intentions of the United States Government toward them, I concluded that there were certain words and expressions therein [the President's proclamation], such as "sovereignty," "right of cession," and those which directed immediate occupation, etc., which, though most admirably employed and tersely expressive of actual conditions, might be advantageously used by the Tagalo war party to incite widespread hostilities among the natives. The ignorant classes had been taught to believe that certain words, as "sovereignty," "protection," etc., had peculiar meaning disastrous to their welfare and significant of future political domination, like that from which they had recently been freed.

It was my opinion, therefore, that I would be justified in so amending the paper that the beneficent object of the United States Government would be brought clearly within the comprehension of the people, and this conclusion was the more readily reached because of the radical change of the past few days in the constitution of Aguinaldo's government, which could not have been understood at Washington at the time the proclamation was prepared. It was also believed that the proclamation had been induced partially by the suggestions of the naval authorities here, which three weeks previous, and while affairs were in a specific and comparatively quiet state, had recommended "that the President issue a proclamation defining the policy of the United States Government in the Philippine Islands and assuring the inhabitants that it is our intention to interfere as little as possible in the internal affairs of the islands; that as soon as they developed their capability for self-government their powers and privileges will be increased. That will allay the spirit of unrest."

What "beneficent object?" We could only have two purposes—one to assist those people in accordance with our pledge to the Cubans to establish a free government for themselves and the other to take away from them their liberty. One or the other of these must be our purpose. It developed in the President's proclamation that the purpose of the United States was to take away their liberty. But General Otis says, "We must disguise this purpose; we must so amend this proclamation that the Filipinos will not be misled and the benevolent purpose of the United States be misunderstood."

Why, Mr. Chairman, I can not believe otherwise than that General Otis at the time he took this liberty with the President's proclamation, believed that the language used by the President did not convey the purpose of the Administration. As a liberty-loving man, as a self-respecting American citizen bearing a commission from his Government, he was justified even in taking the position that the President used terms which he did not intend to use. If that was not his understanding, then his words which I have quoted are used as irony.

The sarcasm, the biting, burning sarcasm, with which he blisters the President of the United States in that dispatch amounts to insubordination for which he might have been court-martialed.

But, Mr. Chairman, a peculiar temper pervades the mind of the annexationist of to-day. It is needless to stand here and discuss the analogies between the acquisition of the Philippines and the acquisition of the Louisiana purchase. Why not come up and consider this question upon its merits?

Everybody knows that different reasons existed in the two cases; that different objections obtained. I shall not pause to discuss that phase of the question. The first question is, Do we need the Philippines; and if so, for what purpose? The second is, Have we the right, under the Constitution, to acquire them? And a third question is, If we have the right, and if we have a need for them, can we, under our traditions, under the broad pledge of this great Union of States, under every observance by which we have grown great and strong and mighty as a nation, afford to tear down the beautiful temple of liberty which we ourselves have constructed and make it a waste place and a burying ground for the blasted hopes of humanity—for the dead aspirations of those who have striven for freedom?

The President and his commission would have us believe that the natives—those engaged in resistance to our arms—are brutal and cruel and have no conception of free government, nor desire for it, and that if we withdraw, chaos would follow and lawlessness run riot; that they are incapable of forming a government. To refute this we have not only the direct testimony of Admiral Dewey, but he reports the testimony of officers whom he sent on a tour of inspection of 600 miles in the interior, where the Tagal government was in force.

I shall not go into a discussion of the constitutional questions involved in the Administration's purposes. My object is only to make plain what it is intended shall be done and how, and to expose the insincerity of the motives and plans, that the American people, who must ultimately determine this question for themselves, may know what they are to pass upon. I said a moment ago that a peculiar temper prevails. Men are inspired these days with great contempt for constitutional obstructions. Gentlemen of this House have been busy for weeks and are still engaged in seeking some constitutional sanction for imperialism, for holding subject provinces by military power. If they fail, and they will, I nevertheless expect to hear them assert it. They should, if they intend to persist in their purpose, be as honest as Mr. Whitelaw Reid. During the summer I received a copy of a speech delivered by him before the Miami University, in Ohio, upon the subject of the duty of the American Government in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. Reid takes up this question of constitutionality and the rights of the United States to acquire territory for purposes other than that of statehood. Under the Constitution, according to the contention of some, and as I myself believe, as interpreted in the decisions rendered by Chief Justice Marshall and followed by the Supreme Court in other decisions, our constitutional power is limited to acquiring territory for statehood. But I care not to discuss that. I am showing now the temper which possesses the minds of men. Mr. Whitelaw Reid takes up these decisions and refers to what Jefferson and Madison said. He comments upon what Senator HOAR has said and upon the decisions of Chief Justices Marshall and Taney, and he uses this startling language. I quote from memory:

> I would not by a hair's breadth disparage the weight to be attached to the opinions and decisions of these learned men; but I can not believe that any dispassionate person can read these decisions and opinions in the light of surrounding circumstances and the conditions under which they were rendered and expressed and come to any other conclusion than that they are flimsy as a cobweb.

Behold, Mr. Chairman, a greater than Washington is here, a more profound and learned jurist than Marshall, a greater patriot than Jefferson, a wiser than any of the fathers—the gentleman who assisted in negotiating the treaty with Spain at the dagger's point and wrested from her her poor title to possession which she was not able to maintain against the insurrectionists themselves and to enforce her authority beyond the narrowest limits.

Not only does Mr. Reid say this; he goes further, and makes assertions each more startling and dangerous. I am sorry that I have not here a copy of his address. I tried to procure it, but was unable to find it in the Library or elsewhere. I state it from memory, but I pledge myself to the correctness of its substance, if I do not give it in the exact language, and I can almost do that. In speaking of the purposes of this Government and our possibilities as a nation, he says:

> Neither chains forged in the Constitution, nor chains of precedent, nor yet the dead hand of the Father of his Country, whom we all revere, can prevent us as a nation from doing anything that any other nation could do or meeting any emergency which arises or discharging any obligation which imposes.

There you are! What useful function is left for the Constitution?

What is meant, Mr. Chairman, by this? When an emergency arises, the Constitution, if it stand in the way, will be disregarded. If an obligation imposes, we will discharge that obligation without reference to the organic law of the land—throw it aside, just as his colleague and compeers have cast aside the Declaration of Independence and trodden it under foot. We will not be bound by chains forged in the Constitution. We will perform our purpose, whatever that purpose may be.

Mr. Chairman, who is to determine when the emergency arises? Who is to decide when an obligation is imposed? If we cast ourselves loose from all moorings to constitutional safeguards, then we are left to the opinion of any bare majority which may get control of the affairs of the Government, and in this instance we should be left to the dictation of a class of statesmen whom I for one am unwilling to intrust with the sacred rights of the people unrestrained by "chains forged in the Constitution."

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. ALLEN of Maine). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have leave to finish his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Arkansas be allowed to finish his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DINSMORE. Are the Filipinos to become citizens under the new order of things, enjoying equal rights with us? Nobody will be bold enough to propose that. Mr. Whitelaw Reid, in the address to which I have referred, says that "it is not to be considered or thought of; they are not fit for it; they can not be made so;" and he holds that they should be held as a subject province under the dominion of the United States, suffering such impositions as we impose upon them, and denied the blessings that are enjoyed by our citizens. Is this Americanism? When did it become so?

Why, Mr. Chairman, the very thing our fathers fought against was taxation without representation. Can it be that England had no right in justice or morals to impose such burdens upon us, who were confessedly her subjects, and that we may honorably and rightly exercise such power over the Filipinos, who have never owed us any kind of allegiance? I am sorry indeed to find people who seem to think so.

Have we already advanced the car of liberty so far that we may now reverse its wheels? Have we done so much for the fair goddess that we may now turn and rend her? Oh, that patriotism might inspire the hearts of Americans with love of country rather than desire for conquest and greed for ill-got gold!

Oh, that our people might be governed now, as in the past, by the one desire to make of this a great proud republic, where peace may ever abide and the happiness of our citizens at home be the chiefest aim, the first purpose of the laws. Shall our flag, that we all love because it has ever been the emblem of liberty, of the universal equality of man, of his right to govern himself, of the immortal principle that government derives its just powers from the consent of the governed, whose bright constellation and flowing stripes remind us of our growth in power and dominion and happiness, while adhering to the safe traditions grown out of the Declaration of Independence—shall it be the ensign that shall float over the heads of people held in subjection to our laws by military power against their will, laws that discriminate against them and deny them participation in the blessings that we enjoy? God preserve it from such disgrace. God restrain our people from the perpetration of such a wrong. God make us strong in the future, as we have been in the past, for the establishment and promotion of liberty in our own land, by the light of our example inspiring it throughout all the world. [Loud applause.]

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. I wish to ask the gentleman one question, if he will answer it.

Mr. DINSMORE. With pleasure, if I can.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. There is, of course, a great diversity of opinion among those who are honestly seeking to arrive at a conclusion as to the most honorable course to be pursued in the treatment of the Philippine Islands, both immediately and in the future. Is it the gentleman's view that the United States troops in the Philippines should be immediately withdrawn and leave the Filipinos absolutely to their own devices?

Mr. DINSMORE. Immediately?

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. That they be immediately left to their own devices?

Mr. DINSMORE. I do not think they ought to be immediately withdrawn. I have already stated to the House that I think our course with reference to them should be the same as our course was promised to be to Cuba, whether we ever fulfill it or not. I hold that the highest and first duty of the American Government is to our own people, without reference to what may happen to anybody else. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. I would like to ask the gentleman one further question. Would the gentleman be in favor of the retention of the Philippines at the request of the Filipinos?

Mr. DINSMORE. Oh, well, Mr. Chairman, that is the same question propounded with reference to Cuba.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. I am asking it honestly and sincerely.

Mr. DINSMORE. I would not. If I could be satisfied that a substantial majority of Cubans should desire it, I might be willing to take them; but the Philippines, so remote from us—I care not what may be said about the obliteration of time and distance in communication—and so near to other powers struggling for supremacy in the Orient, I would not be willing to take under any view.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. So numerous and so alien.

Mr. DINSMORE. Yes; so filled with people who never can be homogeneous with us. I do not want them. I think they would be an injury rather than a blessing to us.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. Does the gentleman from Arkansas think that if we retained the Philippines with the consent of the Filipinos it would be of commercial advantage or disadvantage to this country?

Mr. DINSMORE. I think it would be an absolute impossibility within years to come for us to know whether we had the consent of the Filipinos, particularly while we are in military occupation. Let me say that I do not care how much they might desire it, I should be opposed ever to taking them, because I think it would be a menace to us and a danger, without compensating advantages.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. I agree with the gentleman that it may be difficult to ascertain the opinion of all the Filipinos; but supposing by a proper plebiscite they should request retention by the United States, does the gentleman think it would be to the advantage or the disadvantage of the United States from a commercial point of view?

Mr. DINSMORE. I do not think it would be of any advantage to us from a commercial point of view. I have already stated that I believe that healthful, desirable, profitable trade follows peace rather than war, thrift rather than force, and that we should maintain relations of peace with the world and adhere to the injunction of our fathers to keep free from entangling alliances. I believe that an adherence to the Monroe doctrine rather than a departure from it would promote our commerce, our happiness, and our safety.

One more word in closing. Mr. Chairman, I have a horrible fear that if this thing is done, it may be the beginning of the end. It will be done unless prevented by the people in the ensuing election. The decree of the Administration has gone forth. When Americans deprive other people of liberty as they desire it, I tremble for our own. Perhaps the roseate view of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] is the correct one, but mine at least accords with history in the past, and his is based only upon hope and pride of race. [Applause.]

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Chairman, the House has under consideration the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill. The slight changes in the items thereof have been so well explained by the chairman of the committee that I do not see that it is necessary to go further in that direction. But, Mr. Chairman, the thought arises whether we, as representatives of the people, in simply passing the appropriation bills for the different branches of our Government, perform our whole duty in not looking into the condition and state of them to see whether our appropriations are wisely bestowed and whether they are organized for the fullest efficiency and for the greatest degree of economy.

In appropriating the various items of the sum total for our consular service, should we not look into that branch, a most important one in the commercial relations of our country, and see what its organization is to-day, what are the principles upon which it is founded, and what is the efficiency of the personnel of that service? It strikes me that this would be a proper function to be performed by the representatives of the people in passing this annual appropriation bill, and I ask the attention of the committee for a short time while I call attention to the present organization and the conditions that exist in our consular service to-day.

It is a curious fact, Mr. Chairman, that with all the energy and push shown by the business men of our country in developing trade at home and their exports abroad, they have paid so little attention to this most important service which represents the best interests of our country in foreign lands. It is even a more curious fact that those who are intrusted with the government of our country, both the executive and the legislative branches, have paid but little attention to this important service from the foundation of the service by the act of 1780. Nothing was done in the whole history of our country to enlarge or improve the service until 1883, when a bill was passed taking away, to a large degree, the shipping fees which had grown to be such a sore in the service and brought it into such disrepute that it was found absolutely necessary to take some step in that direction. From that day to this there has been no practical legislation bearing upon this important service in our country.

Some of the consulates that were of great importance since that time, owing to changes in the trade, have become less so, and those that had no factor in the development of our trade practically, owing to geographical and political changes, have become some of the most important in the service. The compensation attaching to these various positions has not been changed, while the cost of living has greatly increased. The whole system of salaries in the service is hodgepodge, some increased here and there under diplomatic appropriation bills, but as a whole not founded on any idea of system or proper compensation for the amount of work done or the ability of the incumbent that holds the office.

Such changes in condition show the necessity for a careful revision of the salaries throughout the service. As an example of the incongruous condition which this detached legislation has imposed upon the service the following are cited:

The consulate at Nuremberg, Germany, a city of 160,000 inhabitants, has a salary of $3,000, and the consulate at Fürth, but a few minutes distant by street car, has a salary of $2,000.

On the other hand, the important consulates at Mannheim and Munich, the latter the capital of Bavaria, a city of 405,000 inhabitants and the residence of a large American colony, have a salary of only $1,500 each.

The values of declared exports to the United States from the Mannheim district in 1894 were $3,648,989; in 1895, $3,875,538; and in 1896, $3,468,261; while those from Nuremberg were, 1894, $1,406,740; 1895, $1,525,204; and in 1896, $1,561,521.

The case at Kehl is even more striking, for the district of that consulate includes all of Lorraine and a large part of Alsace, where the cases of friction between the authorities and naturalized American citizens, natives of those provinces, are of constant occurrence and require on the part of the United States consul the exercise of firmness and diplomatic discretion, while the duties of the consul at Munich, with its large number of inhabitants, many of them being Americans, requires the assiduous and constant attention of the person occupying that position.

The recital of these facts assuredly shows the need of the revision in our consular service, and they could be amplified in every portion of the globe to which that service is extended.

Thus it will be seen that from a business standpoint the service to-day is in a most mixed and unsatisfactory condition. Let us look at the organization of the service: let us see how the appointments are made, what qualifications are deemed necessary, and what is the tenure of office. I wish it distinctly understood that I am speaking absolutely from a nonpartisan standpoint. I do not attack the Administration of either political party. I hold that under the present system it is absolutely impossible for the Executive of our Republic or for any Senator or Representative, however earnest or highly qualified he may be, to stand up against the political pressure that is brought to bear to-day to secure political appointments in our consular service.

The advantage of a reorganization of our consular service has been called to the attention of Congress from time to time by those who saw the growing necessity for some legislation in that regard. The Department of State has long recognized the inadequacy of the consular service to the growing needs of the country and to the proper protection of the business and property of our citizens residing abroad, either for business or the pleasure of travel.

Secretary of State Livingstone, in 1833, and Secretary of State Buchanan, in 1846, called attention to the evils existing in the service, but it was not until 1884, when Secretary of State Frelinghuysen discussed the subject in his admirable and exhaustive report transmitted to Congress by President Arthur March 20 of that year, that the strong necessity for action was made apparent. In it he said:

> Until recently the demands of Europe, which consumed the greater portion of our exports, and the condition of the producing countries were such as to give us control in the supply of certain products, such as breadstuffs, provisions, cotton, and petroleum, etc. The demands of Europe for all these products and of the other continents for petroleum especially were so positive, and our producing conditions so favorable, as to give us practically a monopoly for their supply.
>
> These conditions of international demand and supply are undergoing radical changes, which the near future will intensify.
> The efforts which have been made and which are being made by Europe to enlarge the field of supply in the above-mentioned products, aided by the ambition which prevails in all countries for the development of natural and artificial resources to meet their own wants and to supply the wants of others, have resulted in awakening competition for the supply even of those products which we have heretofore controlled. It is true that thus far this competition has not affected our trade to any appreciable extent, but the desire for development which is now abroad and the ambition which prevails to increase the production (outside of the United States) of the foregoing articles render consular supervision of absolute importance. The complex commercial relations and industrial interests which now prevail in Europe have originated hostility to American products in many countries and afford additional reasons for the enlargement and perfection of the consular service.

The same necessity has been pressed upon the Government at home by our representatives in the service abroad. In 1864 John Bigelow, consul at Paris, wrote:

> The practical results of our system, which in this respect has no parallel under any other government, are—
>
> (1) That we are obliged to select for consular posts men without the proper training and qualifications.
>
> (2) We are obliged to select men who have no intention of making a career in the consular service. Consequently they have no great inducement to qualify themselves properly for a post which they can hope to hold only for a brief term by the acquisition of knowledge of little or no use to them in any other profession.
>
> (3) The fact that our consuls are so transitory deprives them of their proper influence in the consular body, as well as in most political and social circles where it is the interest of the Government that they should circulate.
>
> (4) Such frequent changes prevent anything like uniformity or regularity in the conduct of consular business, which results in a serious prejudice to commerce and a grave inconvenience to the Department.
>
> (5) With each change of Administration the Government is exposed to lose the benefit of whatever knowledge and influence its agents have acquired during their terms of service, and thus most of the time is served by raw, and, therefore, to a considerable extent, by incompetent officers.
>
> There is no other country in the world where the tenure of the consular office is dependent upon the permanence of the home administration. Nor can the practice be defended by any consideration whatever which looks to its usefulness and efficiency.

Surely no stronger evidence could be adduced, coming from one of experience in the consular service.

The Hon. Robert Adams, jr., when United States minister to Brazil, in 1889, wrote in the North American Review:

> The method by which the men are chosen for the positions necessarily brings forth poor candidates, while the short tenure of office, which is generally limited to the Presidential term, almost certainly so if a change of party takes place, and the meager salaries paid—in some posts hardly sufficient to support life in a respectable manner—deters competent men from entering the service. It should also be remembered that there is no promotion for efficient service; that a consul can not hope for a change of climate from a trying to a more healthful and genial one after a given period of service, and that there is always the prospect of returning to the United States broken down in health, unfitted to resume private business, and without prospect of further employment at the hands of the Government.

Assistant Secretary Rockhill, in an article in the Forum for the month of February, 1897, sums up the evils of our consular system as follows:

> (1) Imperfect mode of selection of consular officers.
> (2) No permanency of tenure.
> (3) Inadequate compensation, resulting in (a) the exaction of excessive fees and (b) the creation of consular agencies to increase salaries.
> (4) Excessive number of feed consulates and commercial agencies.
> (5) Imperfect enforcement of regulations, especially as regards amounts of fees and their collection.

This judgment from the late Assistant Secretary of State, who had especial charge of the consular service, is certainly deserving of great weight upon this subject.

It is proposed to place all grades of consuls under a salary and to do away with consular and commercial agencies, and provide that all fees of all kinds must be accounted for and covered into the United States Treasury. Of the advantages of this system over the present one abundant evidence is presented by those most conversant with the needs of the service. In 1871 Inspector Keim reported:

> The act of 1856 was doubtless designed to correct the most conspicuous of the abuses which prevailed. * * * The evils prior to that date may have been mitigated or may have suffered temporary abatement. * * * They were certainly not eradicated: and these abuses * * * have been perpetuated in most cases by each succeeding officer.

Again, in 1879, Gen. Julius Stahel, then consul at Hiogo, Japan, wrote to the Department of State:

> The permission granted to consular officers of receiving unofficial fees for notarial acts, etc., is liable to abuse, and is the root of many evils and irregularities. * * * I suggest that the permission to charge unofficial fees be withdrawn, and that all fees received by consular officers, for whatsoever service rendered, be considered as official, and so accounted for. * * * In this way one of the greatest evils of our service would be remedied and dignity added to the representation of the United States in foreign countries.

Secretary Frelinghuysen, in his report of 1884 on the consular service, said:

> In the opinion of the Department, the present system of compensation by fees, either official or unofficial, should be abolished. Whatever money comes into the consul's hands should be turned into the Treasury of the United States, and he should depend for his support entirely upon the salary allowed by Congress.

In 1885, writing on the same subject to the Department, Gen. John S. Mosby, consul at Hongkong, expressed himself even more emphatically:

> Consular fees should, in my opinion, be altogether abolished. * * * The best way to secure honesty in the public service is to make it impossible for officers to be dishonest. I can see no sound reason for sending consuls abroad to collect revenue for the Government. You might as well send the Navy to do it.

The personnel of the service has improved under the orders issued by President Cleveland and President Harrison, and which are being carried out by the present Executive. But that is only a step in the right direction; it is liable to be overturned at any time; it is transient in its nature, and the appointment is still a subject of political pressure.

What business man who wanted to choose a clerk in his business would allow some outside person to bring a candidate for that position and say, without regard to his fitness, "This man must be appointed," and to back that up with sufficient personal and political influence to force that person into the place? That is the present status of our consular service. To-day men are not appointed for their qualifications or their fitness; they are appointed under political pressure.

I know the feeling that exists among many members of this House against what is known as "civil-service reform." Now, I do not wish to be misunderstood in regard to my ideas on this subject. I know that many members of this House are loath to part with any patronage which they think may be of any assistance to them during their renomination. I would call the attention of such gentlemen to this fact in regard to appointments in the consular service: You may have three or four applicants in your district for appointment as consul to a particular place. In the distribution of patronage it is absolutely impossible, however great may be your influence, for you to get more than one person appointed in your district.

Now, my friends, what is the practical result of securing this appointment? The only gentleman whom you have favored and upon whose support you may think you can rely is sent out of the country, and the three gentlemen whom you have disappointed remain at home, each vowing vengeance in his heart—each ready to take the greatest satisfaction in preventing your return to Congress when you come up for renomination. And the one friend upon whom you thought you had the right to rely for support and aid will write to you that owing to the smallness of his compensation and the largeness of his family and expensiveness of the trip, however glad he would be to come home and give you that support which gratitude would indicate as his duty, he regrets that under the circumstances it will be utterly impossible for him to come back.

So I say that any member of this House who thinks that he is securing assistance in his political life or a continuance of his political position by controlling such appointments will, if he will look into the matter carefully, see that the sooner this sort of so-called "influence" is removed the more likely will be the continuance of his tenure in office and the retention of his seat.

Suppose, Mr. Chairman, that a good business man does receive one of these appointments. Suppose he is admirably fitted to report on the commercial necessities of the country to which he is accredited and to inform our people at home of what those countries have to sell to us or exchange with us in commerce. I acknowledge that the previous business experience may be of benefit to a consul. But suppose the appointee is simply a good American citizen who speaks only good "United States." Suppose he is sent, as he most likely will be, to a country where his native language is scarcely spoken at all or scarcely understood. Can anyone maintain that after this man has been there four years and has acquired the language and has become able to read the newspapers and the trade reports and to inquire and report upon the needs of the country—what that country needs to buy and what it has to sell us—is there a business or professional man in this House who will contend that the system is founded on a sound principle which would bring that man home at the end of four years and send out another to go through the same course of schooling and to be also brought home when he has acquired sufficient knowledge to perform well the duties of the consulship? I think these facts are self-evident propositions that any man can realize.

Mr. Chairman, bills have been introduced into this House for the purpose of putting this whole service under a long tenure, conditioned upon passing examinations for the entering of the service, removals to be only on account of misbehavior or unfitness, with the service divided into classes, and promotions from one class to the other for diligence and ability. It is to these measures that for a few moments I invite the attention of the House, to improve the conditions which now exist.

Very few people, Mr. Chairman, realize the full functions of a consul while he is performing his duties abroad. If the House will bear with me, I will read briefly in order to impress upon them the importance of this branch of the service:

Consuls are appointed to reside abroad for the purpose of protecting, facilitating, and extending commerce between the countries which appoint them and the countries whither they are sent. Their functions, however, are not limited to commercial transactions. They stand as the protectors and advisers of their countrymen present in foreign lands; they act as judges, notaries, and administrators of interests and of all property of such as have no legal representative; they have to prevent frauds on the revenue; to notice infractions of treaty stipulations relating to trade; to advise their government of new laws or regulations within their districts; to preserve the discipline of the commercial marine; to guard seamen from oppression, and they are expected to aid the destitute, for which purpose no funds are available except their meager salary.

Consuls are also required to prepare from time to time reports upon matters affecting commercial, industrial, financial, and agricultural interests; regarding labor, rate of wages, hours of work, and the condition of working people. In preparing these reports they are to bear in mind that the principal purpose to be served is the extension and encouragement of American industry at home and of her commerce abroad. Certainly these are duties sufficiently arduous and numerous to require for their faithful performance all the intelligence, honor, and patriotism of the best citizens of the Republic.

Mr. Chairman, that is an extract from an article that I wrote as much as ten years ago for the North American Review. It was written in consequence of my personal observations in South America, whither I had been sent officially as United States minister to Brazil. I visited every consulate, from Para down to Buenos Ayres, on the west coast. I do not wish to refer personally to the conditions I found there, for, as I have already stated, it is the system to which I wish to call attention, and not the personnel, because, until the system is changed, it is beyond the power of man to entirely change the conditions.

A consul at the present time has no incentive to work. Why should a man who is sent to a bad climate, who knows that at the end of four years, even if his own political party remains in power, he will be called home in order that some other man may be rewarded? What incentive has that man in a tropical climate to arouse his energy to work to the full measure of his ability?

Under these bills which have been introduced—and one of which I hope will be reported for submission to this House—the service is divided into classes, and a man can be promoted from one to the other by the State Department under direction of the President. Not only that, but make this a long-tenure service and you will find that young men in our country, the same as they do in others, will fit themselves for this profession and enter it as a livelihood. They would not be warranted under present conditions in expending the time and money necessary to take a two years' course or even a shorter time. That amount of capital would not be warranted to be invested unless a young man felt that he had a life service or a long-tenure service before him. The universities are already inquiring. I have had communications from two colleges this winter asking if it would be possible, if this bill were to pass, that they could institute special courses in the universities to prepare young men for this service.

Our consuls should be trained for their positions and pass an examination on such subjects as the laws regulating shipping, the commercial treaties existing between their own and other countries, the laws relating to intestates, on the consular regulations of the United States, and on such other subjects as relate to their duties. They should also be required to have a practical knowledge of French or of the language of the country to which they are to be sent. It will be demanded, "Where will such a specially educated class come from?" Once it is understood that the service is a permanent one, young men will prepare for it the same as they do for other professions, and in sufficient numbers to arouse competition. That this was not a matter of conjecture was fully established by the experience in Great Britain when the examination for the civil service was thrown open to all, the number of applicants having increased the first year from 5,000 to 15,000 and the character and ability of the applicants having proved as high as if not better than that of the selected applicants had been before.

To insure this, however, the salaries must be raised. How can a man be expected to live at Para, in Brazil, under an equatorial sun, exposed to malarial and yellow fevers, and deprived almost entirely of all social intercourse, for $2,000 a year; or, even worse, at Santos, where the town was decimated by yellow fever, the victims including the United States vice-consul? Yet the importance of the first position to our country can best be stated by the value of the exports to the United States, which amount annually to $7,000,000, while the annual export of coffee alone from the second port to our country is $30,000,000. These cases could be amplified, but they are sufficient to illustrate the present state of affairs.

Nowhere is the adage "The best is the cheapest" more forcibly illustrated than in the consular service. Had it been composed of the proper material, no necessity could have arisen for the establishment of the South American Bureau or of sending special commissioners to the foreign governments to make arrangements for the exhibits at the Columbian Exposition.

Mr. Chairman, I am an American in my love for my country and in my belief in its institutions, but I am not so wrapped up in patriotism that I do not think our Republic, which is young compared with the other nations of the world, can not learn from other countries. We are the only civilized nation to-day that allows this important branch of its service to be run on haphazard appointments and without proper control. England, France, Germany, Russia, Italy, Turkey, every country has this service organized in such a way that men can become acquainted with their duties and can make more efficient reports. As trade expands and commerce becomes more complicated and competition becomes more keen, the necessity that our merchants should have the most accurate information gathered by trained men who know just what is required, and not gathered haphazard, with an energy that may be commendable but which is not advisable, all this becomes more important for those at home. All the countries which I have mentioned have a service in which men are promoted for their ability and their efficiency from one post to another.

It has been advanced that some of our consuls make admirable reports. I acknowledge that fact with great pleasure, Mr. Chairman, and those gentlemen deserve all credit for their loyalty and devotion to their country, but those men and those reports are accidents and do not come as the result of a principle. These men were appointed at the suggestion of some one, but for every good man who is appointed it is just as likely, under the present system, that a bad one may come next. There is no regulation or organization of the system.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what I contend is that this great service of our country, which represents its business and commercial interests, should be founded on principle, so that every appointee should be qualified for the place, so that every man who does his duty and makes good reports will be assured of promotion, and every man who is sent to an undesirable post with an almost deadly climate may at least live in the hope that if he arouses his energies in that enervating atmosphere and performs his duties with credit, in a short space of time he may receive promotion and be moved up in the service.

In conclusion, without going into the political question which has been raised by my distinguished colleague from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE], I will simply take the physical fact that our country is about to expand territorially. Just so surely as that takes place, it must expand commercially. The energy and the enterprise of the American people will not allow any opportunity to pass where they can add to the wealth and industry and employ the labor of our great country.

Mr. Chairman, in my judgment, the possession of the Philippine Islands is a mere stepping-stone to the great trade for which all Europe is grasping in China and the East. Whatever advantages they may offer, of themselves, sink into insignificance compared to the trade that is going to open to the civilized nations of the world with the 400,000,000 people, semicivilized at least, who taunt us with our civilization, for they think theirs is much older, but who are certainly civilized sufficiently to use our goods, to employ our machinery, to market our electrical appliances and railroad supplies and other such commodities which our country exports. Surely we must have reliable information from these regions if we wish to secure their trade. Surely we should have men there who are specially prepared to report what is necessary.

Just to illustrate how perfectly useless a haphazard citizen would be to send as consul to China, on Saturday it was my privilege to accompany the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee to an institution in Philadelphia, which is established to expand our export trade; and one of the most curious things submitted to that committee was a report from China, with a great number of illustrations of the stamps to be put on the covers of the goods to be sent there. For if you impugn or slight in any degree the religion or any of the traditions of China by any labels that you put on the goods, or any design in the patterns that go there, you might as well take those goods and burn them up in a bonfire. This is one illustration, Mr. Chairman, that relates to the cotton goods to supply 400,000,000 people. I do not think any consul, unless he had previous training and had had his attention called to the subject, would be likely to learn this one thing until he had resided in China some time; and even then, if he had the incentive of longevity, I question if he would have the time, the trouble, to report that to his own government.

Mr. Chairman, this opportunity that is now coming before our country for the extension of our trade and commerce is one of the principal reasons why I press this question upon the House and why I urged this legislation before the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which I think should induce the committee to report one of the bills that has been submitted to it. The measure has the entire support of the business community. The National Board of Trade, assembled in Washington only last week, is unanimously indorsing the principle of this bill. The boards of trade of Chicago, Cleveland, New York, and Philadelphia sent deputations to appear before our committee to urge the passage of some such measure as this; and I have taken this opportunity to call the attention of the House to the question, hoping to arouse general interest in this great question, which will tend as much to the development of the prosperity of our country as any measure that will come before it this session of Congress.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, a correspondent of the London Times once wrote to that paper stating that he sent it a long letter because he did not have time enough to prepare a short one. That was a very philosophic remark. I, perhaps, will speak longer to-day than if I had had time to write out a speech on the Philippine question, to which I propose to devote myself exclusively. In order that there may be no question whatever about what I think upon this subject, I propose to begin with a few plain propositions which I intend to discuss.

A man does not have to be an idiot in order to be a patriot. A man is not a traitor because he is opposed to doing those things which jeopardize the existence of this Republic.

An American is not a pessimist because he is unwilling to see his country adopt as a settled creed the political principles of Alexander, Cæsar, or Napoleon.

In the hands of political jobbers the American flag, like the mantle of charity, will be made to cover a multitude of sins. I do not care a baubee about Aguinaldo or the Philippinos. My sympathy, my heart, my solicitude, goes out to the American people. I think more, far more, of the liberties of my children than of all the trade of all the earth. I would like to leave them both rich and free, but of the two I would infinitely prefer to leave them free—free to labor, free to work out their own destiny, free to sympathize with and help all people everywhere struggling for liberty. I would not give the life of one healthy, honest, moral, patriotic, ambitious American white boy in exchange for all the Philippinos [applause] now in the archipelago or who will be there until the great judgment day. Believing firmly—and I will answer your question, my good friend——

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. Thank you.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Believing firmly that the annexation of the Philippines, either forcibly or with the consent of the people of those islands, will in the end prove dangerous, if not ruinous, to our "government of the people, by the people, and for the people," I am dead against it now, henceforth, and forever. I would be against annexing them if every man, woman, and child in the Philippine Islands stood beseeching us to annex them.

Crimination and recrimination are not ideal methods of ascertaining truth or of discovering either the path of duty or the best interests of ourselves and of our posterity.

It must be taken for granted that every citizen of the Republic worthy of his birthright of freedom is heartily in favor of perpetuating our representative Government.

No more important question was ever before the American Congress than the one which now confronts us of determining our relations to the Philippine Islands. Upon its solution depend our own prosperity and happiness no less than the happiness and prosperity of the Philippinos. For its consideration and determination I invoke the patient study, careful investigation, deliberate judgment, and purest patriotism of every man upon this floor.

What has been done and said is not of as much consequence as what will hereafter be done and said. Thus far propositions offered and theories advanced have been tentative in their character. In military parlance, divers and sundry gentlemen, from the President down to the junior Senator from Indiana, have been "feeling the position," listening for the vox populi, and trying, let us hope, all of them, to learn what is right and what is best for us to do in the position of indubitable difficulty in which we find ourselves.

But the time is coming, and it is coming rapidly, when we must adopt a permanent policy that we are willing to stand or to fall by.

Mr. Chairman, it looks as if we had the Philippine Islands in theory. We have them not in fact. It was first said that we had them by conquest; but the President gives up that proposition, if he ever held it. Judge Day, who was at the head of the Peace Commission, says: "If we have any claim over there, it is a right by purchase and not by conquest." Now, what are we doing? I invite your attention, and, if need be your questions, because, as this is not a written, cast-iron, prepared speech, it admits of elasticity; and I am not sure but what we shall arrive at a wise and righteous conclusion a great deal sooner by questioning each other than by making set speeches.

Section 10 of the treaty of Paris provides—

> That the civil rights and political status of the native inhabitants of the territories hereby ceded to the United States shall be determined by the Congress.

The phrase "the territories hereby ceded" means the Philippines.

Nearly fourteen months have gone to join the years before the flood since that treaty was signed—to-morrow will be the anniversary of its ratification by the Senate—yet Congress has done nothing, absolutely nothing, has not even attempted to do anything, toward carrying out that provision of the treaty to "determine the civil rights and political status" of those far-away and unhappy islanders.

The status of the Philippines and the rights of Americans are left, like Mohammed's coffin, suspended between heaven and earth.

After that treaty was ratified by the Senate, imitating the example of the man who locked the barn after the horse was gone, that body passed a resolution by way of construing the treaty, in which it declares "that by the ratification of the treaty of peace with Spain it is not intended to incorporate the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands into citizenship of the United States, nor is it intended to permanently annex said islands as an integral part of the territory of the United States."

That is what the Senate said, but the Senate is not the Congress; and as at least one-half of the Senators have expressed opinions diametrically opposed to that resolution, and as the President of the United States, in his stumping tour through the West in 1898, which changed what would have been a democratic majority into a Republican majority [applause on the Republican side]—the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] does well to applaud, because he would not have been in this Congress if it had not been for Mr. McKinley's speeches [laughter]—as on that tour the President rejected that theory, it must be taken for granted that the Congress does not indorse it.

Now, the primary question is—and I press it home upon your minds and consciences—Does Congress intend to abdicate its functions or not? That is what we have done so far. In the last Congress we frequently inquired what was the policy of the White House, what the policy of the Republican party was. No man on that side of the Chamber ever undertook to say what it was; occasionally and only occasionally one would say what his own theory was. But I wish to repeat that question: Does Congress intend to legislate under the tenth section of the treaty of Paris, as it is in duty bound to do, or does it intend to abdicate its constitutional function and permit the President to run things ad libitum in the Philippines by means of a military satrapy? Judging the future by the past, all that Congress is expected to do in this matter of such far-reaching consequence to the American people is to furnish the money to carry on the government by satraps and to keep up a war which Congress never authorized and which Congress and Congress alone had the constitutional power to authorize. How long is this extraordinary state of affairs to continue? Is it to be continued only till after the election in order to give Republicans a chance to repudiate any particular policy and to advocate the one that appears to be most popular, or is it, like Tennyson's brook, to go on forever?

These questions are not asked for amusement or aggravation, but because the people of America have a right to the information.

Indeed, on several occasions, when, in the other end of the Capitol, gentlemen have offered resolutions of inquiry, the resolutions have been tabled and the patriotism of the authors impugned.

In the days of reconstruction Congress usurped Executive functions until the office of the President of the United States was reduced almost to a nullity. Now the President of the United States usurps legislative functions until Congress has fallen to the low estate of being merely an animated cash register for the executive department of this Government. [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. Which do you like the best?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not like either one. I like for the executive department to attend strictly to its own business, for the legislative department to attend to its business strictly, and for the judicial department to attend to its business strictly, and not undertake to run the politics of this country by issuing an injunction at every full or change of the moon. [Laughter.]

There was a day when the rescripts of the Roman emperors were supposed to be of binding effect throughout their vast domain. It really appears that we are fast sinking to a position when the wish of the President and not the Constitution is the supreme law of the land.

The Spanish war, which Congress declared, really ended in July, 1898; technically it ended with the ratification of the treaty of Paris.

The Philippine war, which Congress never declared, began about the time the Spanish war closed, is still raging, and the end thereof is not even in sight.

One day we are informed by General Otis, our viceroy in Asia, that Aguinaldo is cornered and about to be captured at some distant point; the next day Aguinaldo is fighting within hearing of Manila.

This game of military hide and seek has been played for about a year at a cost to the people of thousands of valuable American lives and of over one hundred millions in hard cash.

The mothers and fathers of the country who are called upon to sacrifice their sons, the overburdened taxpayers who foot the bills, are beginning to exclaim, "How long, O Lord, how long?"

The Spanish war—the war authorized by Congress—added to our renown by the splendid victories of our forces by land and sea and gave us at least two new naval heroes of the first rank—George Dewey and Winfield Scott Schley.

But no man who has any reputation for veracity to lose will assert that the Philippine war has added to either our glory as a people or to the strength of the Republic.

When the Spanish war closed we could have occupied the most enviable position ever held by any nation since creation's dawn, and all we had to do was to do that which we owed it to ourselves to do, and that was to say to both the Cubans and the Philippinos, "The Spaniards are beaten; your chains are broken; you helped us to do this thing; now set up any sort of government you want, and we will make the other nations of the earth keep their hands off of you or we will shoot them off." [Applause.]

We would never have been compelled to fire a gun to make that promise good, for there is not a nation on earth that has any desire to see the fleets of Dewey and of Schley riding triumphantly in their harbors and shelling their seaport cities.

Had we done that, unstinted praises of our disinterestedness and philanthropy would have rung round the world, coupled with the amazing story of American valor and the prowess of Americans in arms. Wherever Old Glory floated it would have been hailed by millions of loving hearts in every quarter of the globe as the emblem of a people who are free themselves and who are willing and anxious that all men everywhere shall be free.

Now, on the principle that a fellow-feeling makes the whole world kin, the crowned and sceptered despots of Europe say to us: "All hail! We welcome you to membership in the ancient and sordid society of land grabbers. As you are the youngest and the strongest, we will give you the largest, choicest, and juiciest slice in partitioning the face of the globe among ourselves. We are in high good humor with you because you have eschewed the pestiferous principles of the Declaration of Independence, the cobweb restrictions of the Constitution, the preposterous sentiments of Washington's Farewell Address, the decisions of the Supreme Court for a century, the presumptuous doctrine of James Monroe, and the solemn advice of Abraham Lincoln. Those men and those principles were well enough in a crude age and among a backwoods people, but this is the last year of the nineteenth century—if not the first of the twentieth—and we will go land hunting, gold hunting, diamond hunting, and man hunting together. As a special favor we will give you all the entangling alliances you want for the rest of your lives, beginning with the Anglo-American alliance."

Just here I desire to make a few remarks upon another question, which is edged in here once in a while. It has been stated upon the floor of this House repeatedly by several Republican members, and it has been hinted at once or twice on this side of the House, that no party can succeed that is merely a party of negation. Now, that sounds very well—that no party will amount to anything that is simply an anti-party. That sounds very well, too. I do not know how much attention you gentlemen have paid to political nomenclature, but I state, without fear of successful contradiction, that no party in this country has ever amounted to anything that did not start out with the word anti prefixed to its name, and it grows out of the very nature of things. The robust party, the party of opposition, must in the very exigencies of the case fight a good many of the theories of the majority.

Let us see if that proposition is not true. The Democratic party as it exists to-day was first called the anti-Federalist party. It won its first great victory by turning John Adams and the Federalists out of this Government under the name of anti-Federalists. Now, if some of these doctrinaires, including my brother from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY], who is not now in his seat, had been living in that day and generation, they would with sublime effrontery have said to Thomas Jefferson and James Madison and Albert Gallatin, "Why, you do not know what you are doing, to call yourselves an anti-Federalist party." After they got in they changed the name of the party by a natural evolution to Republican party; then when the revolution came, which brought on the "era of good feeling"—which was the worst period of American personal politics—we took, under Jackson, the name of Democratic party, which we hold to this day.

Now, how about you Republicans? You started out as the anti-slavery party, and all the victories that you ever won for which history will give you any credit you achieved as the anti-slavery party. You afterwards changed the name to the Republican party. As applied to our institutions, the phrase "Republican party" means absolutely nothing, and the phrase "Democratic party" means absolutely nothing. A Republican is a man that is in favor of representative government; and we all claim to be in favor of that. A democracy is a country where all the people get together and make their own laws, a thing which can only happen in a very small community, like the republics of Greece.

An anti-imperialist of to-day is a man who is in favor of preserving the Republic and is against establishing an empire under the American flag in Asia or elsewhere.

An anti-trust man is one who believes the Ten Commandments, particularly the one which says, "Thou shalt not steal;" who believes in giving every person an equal chance and who believes that competition is the life of trade.

An anti-gold-standard man is one who believes in the money of the Constitution—both silver and gold. And so on to the end of the chapter. So let us hear no more cant about a mere party of negation. We are for everything that is right and "anti" as to everything wrong.

But to return to our mutton. What are we going to do about the Philippines? What is it our duty to do? What have we a right to do? Under the Constitution and the decisions of the Supreme Court we must either refuse to take the Philippines and to hold them permanently or we must admit them as States. There is no escape from that proposition if we are to pay any attention to the highest judicial authority.

It is with the greatest diffidence that I quote the Supreme Court of the United States or any judge thereof. My observation is that everyone admires the Supreme Court and adores it when it has decided his way; and when it decides against him, he reserves to himself the right to go outside and "cuss" the Court. Very much depends on whose ox is gored.

The other day my distinguished friend from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] who sits in front of me and who honors me by his attention, put in a great deal of his time apotheosizing Judge Story, of the Supreme Court of the United States. I do not object to that. Judge Story deserves well at the hands of posterity. But I am going to quote you another judge of the Supreme Court of the United States—John Marshall—for nearly thirty-five years Chief Justice of the United States. I am not enamored of Marshall's politics; he was the rankest Federalist that ever lived; but this tribute is due to him—that he was the greatest jurist that ever sat on that bench; and Judge Story compared with Marshall "is as moonlight unto sunlight, or as water unto wine." Here is what Chief Justice Marshall says in one case:

> The Government of the United States can claim no powers which are not granted to it by the Constitution, and the powers actually granted must be such as are expressly given or given by necessary implication.

Now, please bear in mind who John Marshall was. He was not only Chief Justice, but he was the chief of Federalists. He resolved every doubt in favor of the General Government. But those were his words, and surely Republicans ought to accept them as sufficient. Remember also that he is defining the powers and scope of the Federal Government under the Constitution. We are, or ought to be, at this very hour trying with all the lights before us to ascertain our powers and our rights in dealing with the Philippine Islands under the Constitution.

Again the Supreme Court says:

> A power in the General Government to obtain and hold colonies as dependent Territories over which they (the Congress) might legislate without restriction would be inconsistent with its own existence in its present form.

Those be pertinent words.

Then in another case:

> The power of Congress over the Territories is limited by the obvious purposes for which it was conferred; and those purposes are satisfied by measures which prepare the people of the Territories to become States of the Union.

I want to read that to you again, because upon that proposition turns this whole question. The paramount problem to us and our posterity is, What are we going to do with the Philippines if we get them? I have no doubt about our getting them if we want them, though we have not got them yet; but, as I stated once before upon the floor of this House, in fighting the annexation of the Sandwich Islands, this Government is strong enough to do what it pleases with the nations of the earth; and if we want to, we can take the islands; never fear about that.

But I want to read you that proposition again. This is a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. Now, no Republican or "Goldbug" can afford to say that he is not going to be governed by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, because in 1896 you denounced us all over this land as anarchists because we proposed to do the very same thing that the Republican party had done with the Supreme Court of the United States; that was to reorganize it so that we could get the kind of decision out of it that we wanted. And as for myself, I unhesitatingly say that if I had the power I would reorganize it.

But I will read the proposition again, for you are nearly all lawyers:

The power of Congress over the Territories is limited by the obvious purposes for which it was conferred; and those purposes are satisfied by measures which prepare the people of the Territories to become States of the Union.

Now, I desire to submit this to you while you are cool, while this has not yet become a party question. It is becoming one; but it has not become one yet. Is any man on this floor willing to say that the Philippine Islands shall ever become States of the American Union? I challenge the array on the other side of the House individually for any man there to get up and state that he is in favor of making American States out of the Philippine Islands, either now or hereafter. I pause for a reply.

I will tell you what I think about the Philippinos. One of two things is true about them—either they are fit for self-government or they are not. If they are, in God's name let them govern themselves. If they are not, we do not want them as fellow-citizens.

I will tell you another thing I believe I know about them. No matter whether they are fit to govern themselves or not, they are not fit to govern us [applause], and that is precisely what they will do if we let them in as States.

Do you know when they will come in as States? I will not tell you the date. I am not prophet enough for that; but I will tell you the conditions under which they will come, and the day that they are admitted to the Union the American Union is dead as the mammoths that lived in the glacial period. It may take the Republic a thousand years to die, as it took Rome, but die she will if we admit the Philippine Islands as States, and they will be admitted as States into the American Union—now listen, because this is not a Democratic propaganda—they will be admitted whenever the President of the United States and the Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives are all of the same political party, when a Presidential election is coming on, and the party in power—it does not make a bit of difference which party it is—thinks it needs a few more rotten-borough electoral votes. When those conditions exist at the same time, in they will come.

Now, some people grow very virtuous. I understand that. And they say that no State has ever been admitted for political effect. The man who says that either does not understand the history of his country or he states what he knows is not true. How did Maine get into the Union? It came in to balance Missouri, imperial Missouri.

Mr. LACEY. Are you getting to be an imperialist?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No; I am not an imperialist. I live in an imperial Commonwealth. How did Florida get into the Union? To balance Iowa. How did Nevada come into the sisterhood of States? Because the Republicans thought they needed another State to ratify the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments. How did that bunch of Rocky Mountain States get in here? For two reasons: Benjamin Harrison had an ambition that more States should be admitted during his Presidency than were ever admitted in the Presidency of anybody else; but chiefly because the men then in Congress believed that those States would vote the Republican ticket early, often, and late.

Now, let us see what the Supreme Court says a little further—it is mighty good reading when it is your way:

The Territories acquired by Congress, whether by deed of cession from the original States or by treaty with a foreign country, are held with the object, as soon as their population and condition justify it, of being admitted into the Union as States, upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects.

There you have it. Now, the Philippine Islands have one of the two qualifications. They have the population. Nobody knows how many islands there are. There is not a man in the House or on the earth, except by accident, who can guess within five hundred of the number of the Philippine Islands. Even MARK HANNA can not do it, nor General GROSVENOR, who knows nearly everything. [Laughter.] There is not a man in the United States or on the face of the earth who can tell within 5,000,000 of the number of people there are in these islands. But if you take the lowest estimate, 8,000,000 people, how many States would that make in the American Union equal to the population of Nevada, which at the last election only cast about 9,000 votes and at the Presidential election 12,000? Why, it beggars the imagination to think of the number of almond-eyed, brown-skinned, Mohammedan United States Senators who would sit over there to kill the vote of Gen. FRANCIS MARION COCKRELL, senior and perpetual Senator from the State of Missouri, and those other illustrious conscript fathers.

Now, you gentlemen must look out for breakers. The truth is, the more you study it the less you are going to be in favor of taking those islands in at all. The more the American people think about it the less stomach they are going to have for seeing the liberties of their children imperiled by people who go naked, sleep outdoors, and make their living by eating breadfruit off the trees.

Let us read some more; it is good when it is with you.

The Supreme Court says:

The Constitution was made for the benefit of every citizen of the United States, and there is no citizen, whatever his condition, or wherever he may be within the territory of the United States, who has not a right to its protection.

Now, our Ways and Means Committee—of course I would not say anything disrespectful of that august body, which contains several of the most distinguished statesmen in this House—that committee have been studying what? Politics? No. Finance? No. Political economy? No. Studying lexicography, to find out what constitutes the United States. I am not authorized to speak for that committee, but I understand that they are about to run foul of Brother McKinley's opinion in their definition of what constitutes the United States.

Let me read to you some more from the opinion of the United States Supreme Court:

The personal and civil rights of the inhabitants of the Territories—

It does not help it to call them colonies, for that is a mere subterfuge; that is a piece of legislative legerdemain to undertake to escape a great and grave responsibility to ourselves and our posterity by trying to hide behind the word "colony"—

The personal and civil rights of the inhabitants of the Territories are secured to them as to other citizens by the principles of constitutional liberty, which restrain all agencies of the Government, State and national.

Oh, yes; but these statesmen say they are not going to let the Filipinos come over here. "No, bless your soul; they shall not come." No man who is fit to sit on the Supreme Bench or the circuit bench of the United States or the bench of a State court would tolerate that cheap demagogy for half a minute. Thank God that the American citizen, black or white, brown or copper colored, male or female, has the right, under the Stars and Stripes, to go wherever he pleases within the broad confines of this Republic without asking the consent of any power or getting a pass from the President of the United States. As quick as you make them American citizens, they can come here and drive our white men out of their positions into starvation; and really the men who are back of this propaganda are in favor of doing that very thing. I want to read you a little more. Here is what Judge Cooley says:

And when territory is acquired, the right to suffer States to be formed therefrom, and to receive them into the Union, must follow, of course.

Now, it will not do to say that Judge Cooley is "an old fool," not while the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] is an honored member of this House and while the Roberts case concerns the intelligence of mankind. Listen to Cooley again:

Does this term designate the whole or any particular portion of the American empire? Certainly this question can admit of but one answer. It is the name given to our great Republic, which is composed of States and Territories. The District of Columbia or the territory west of the Missouri is not less within the United States than Maryland or Pennsylvania.

And when territory is acquired, the right to suffer States to be formed therefrom, and to receive them into the Union, must follow, of course, not only because the Constitution confers the power to admit new States without restriction, but because it would be inconsistent with institutions founded on the fundamental idea of self-government that the Federal Government should retain territory under its imperial rule and deny the people the customary local institutions.

Gentlemen, if there ever was a legal proposition proved in this world by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, that string of decisions, and others which might be cited, demonstrate that we can not take the Philippine Islands unless we intend ultimately to make States out of them; or unless you intend to go back to your old doctrine of 1855 and '6 and '7 and '8, and propose to reorganize the Supreme Court of the United States and pack it, as you did in 1868 and '9 to get the legal-tender decisions.

Now, I want to ask it again. I am not making this speech for fun, nor for my health, nor as an oratorical exercise. I am discharging a solemn duty to my country and my kind. I am trying, if possible, to invoke the best thought of this House on all sides of this Chamber on the most momentous proposition that has been discussed within these walls since Sumter was fired on in the spring of 1861. It is more momentous than that, because if the Southern Confederacy had succeeded liberty would not have been dead. There would have been two republics on this continent instead of one. But if we take these Filipinos into partnership with us, then the knell of American liberty is sounded.

On the President's policy, so far as it has been revealed in its nebulosity, the American people are divided into three parts: Those who really indorse it because they believe it will add to the glory and wealth of the Republic; those who oppose it tooth and nail on grounds of highest patriotism and broadest humanity, because they believe that it will be dangerous, perhaps ruinous, to the Republic; those who deem it wrong and hazardous, but say, "We must support the President's policy, right or wrong."

A lover of "government of the people, by the people, and for the people" may respect the first class; he must respect the second class, and he must heartily despise the third class.

The proposition that we must support the President's Philippine policy—whatever that may be—right or wrong, is the veriest rot, an insult to intelligence, a shame upon manhood, a tale told by an idiot, a betrayal of the principle of self-government.

I am willing to go as far as anyone in patriotism. I will support the country in any emergency; but President McKinley is not the country. The time has not yet come—I pray Almighty God that it may never arise—when the American people will accept the arrogant dictum of Louis XIV, when repeated by an American President, "I am the State!"

If President McKinley is at all worthy of his high position, he must entertain a supreme contempt for those political invertebrates, particularly for those claiming to be Democrats, who, in order to catch the crumbs falling from their master's table [applause], go about saying, "The President is wrong in his Philippine policy, but we must support the President." Out upon such cringing sycophancy!

Suppose a case. Suppose that when George III undertook to force our forefathers to pay the stamp tax, Patrick Henry, instead of delivering that great lyric speech before the Virginia house of burgesses, which precipitated the Revolution and which still thrills the heart like strains of martial music, had risen in his place and, cooing gently as a sucking dove, had said, "His Most Gracious Majesty is wrong about this stamp tax, but we must, as loyal subjects, support him, right or wrong." And suppose Washington, Jefferson, Greene, Warren, Lee, Putnam, Hamilton, Franklin, and all that glorious host of warriors and statesmen had weakly agreed to that. What would we be to-day? Instead of being the strongest, the richest, the most beneficent Republic that the sun ever looked down upon, we would still be English colonies, ruled by British proconsuls, without any voice whatsoever in the Government under which we live.

Those immortal state builders had been reared on the pleasant fiction that "the King can do no wrong," but when he did do wrong they boldly and iconoclastically trampled that preposterous falsehood in the dust and, wresting a continent from his iron grasp, made it the home of liberty and dedicated it to the twin propositions, "All men are created equal" and "Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed." There were men in the land in 1776. Are there only manikins now? I do not believe such a monstrous libel on 75,000,000 American citizens. George III did wrong. Our fathers fought and conquered him. William McKinley does wrong. We will oppose and overthrow him under the forms of law. [Applause.]

I wish to make another suggestion along this line of letting these Philippinos in here. Now, Mr. Chairman, this startling proposition presents itself. Ten millions of Asiatics, not one of whom is fit to be an American citizen or to be made an American citizen—because that is what they will be—and have all the rights and privileges of American citizens! They can live on 15 cents a day from habit as well as we can on a dollar a day. Under the tutelage of skillful American teachers they will soon be as competent to use American machinery as our own mechanics, and the result of the whole thing is that American laborers, white and black, are to be brought into competition with the pauper labor of Europe and Asia, which you gentlemen have talked about so long, without a single, solitary compensatory benefit from the theory of free trade.

Now, think about it on the grounds of humanity. We are told that we have commissioned ourselves as a lot of Don Quixotes to go forth into the world in quest of ventures, and that our duty is to carry the blessings of liberty and settled government to the ends of the earth. I deny it. Our duty is to attend to our own business, to secure the blessings of liberty to our posterity.

Now, let us see if we are fit to go into the political missionary business, and on this I challenge your attention. I am going to state facts that are within the common knowledge of all the people here. I ask you reformers over there, are we, the American people, in condition to go into the world as missionaries to carry the blessings of liberty and settled government to all other peoples? My friend from Pennsylvania quoted Scripture the other day, I understand—I was not here; I am sorry I was not—in favor of the imperial doctrine. Why, the devil quoted Scripture on a celebrated occasion in favor of his proposition. [Laughter.]

I will quote you a bit of Scripture that fits it like a glove: "Let every man set his own household in order before he goes to meddling with the households of other people." [Laughter.] Also, "Physician, heal thyself." What kind of a condition are we in to do missionary work? Let us see what we are doing right now. Hanging "niggers" in Mississippi, burning "niggers" in Kentucky, hanging Italians in Louisiana, a double-headed government in Kentucky, one governor assassinated and two living, two governments and two legislatures, and they can not hold a court in some parts of the State, my native State, without calling the militia. Out in Illinois one Sunday evening last summer they had a battle in which more men were killed—and by a strange concatenation of events every one of them had a black hide—more men were killed than at the battle of Palo Alto or Resaca de la Palma.

Out in Idaho the State is under martial law. Up in Maine, the home of civilization and patriotism and learning, last summer they mobbed two preachers, tarred and feathered them, and rode them on a rail because they preached the doctrine of Jesus Christ. [Laughter.] The Washington Post—I wish I had the editorial here—stated that they would have burned them, but the lucifers would not work well. [Laughter.] Thank God, the lucifers were out of fix, or in the closing days of the nineteenth century, in the State of Maine, we should have had two humble followers of the Saviour burned alive because they preached the doctrine of the lowly Nazarene.

Last summer a mob with fury in its eye, murder in its heart, and a rope in its hand, chased a colored man and brother through the woods in Connecticut, the land of steady habits, but whether they ever found him or not I don't know; he has never been heard of since. [Laughter.] What must Charles Sumner, Harriet Beecher Stowe, William Lloyd Garrison, and other departed and distinguished philanthropists think of that, if they think at all amidst their present environments? [Laughter.] A year or two ago they hanged five men on one tree in one night in Indiana, and it was not a very good night for Judge Lynch, either.

Let us take another instance. All last summer the United States courts in this country were run overtime, and all of the judges were liable to be stricken down with nervous prostration, and what were they doing? Busy issuing injunctions at the command of the plutocrats of the land against men exercising the God-given right of earning their bread in the sweat of their faces.

Let us come east a little. If what John Wanamaker says about Matthew Stanley Quay is correct, Quay ought to be in the penitentiary the rest of his natural life [laughter]; and if what he says is not true, Wanamaker is the greatest liar since the days of Ananias and Sapphira. [Laughter.] Perhaps they are both correct. [Laughter.] I will not undertake to decide such a delicate question of Republican morals and Republican etiquette. [Renewed laughter.] The city of Philadelphia, whence my distinguished friend, brother ADAMS, comes, has become so corrupt that, notwithstanding it had 100,000 Republican majority at the last election, it imported ballot-box stuffers and repeaters from the city of Washington merely from the force of habit. [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMS. I want to say to the gentleman from Missouri that the bad people from Washington came up there and led us astray. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Oh, no; that is like the sheep biting the wolf. [Laughter.] Old Dr. Johnson, the author of the English dictionary—and I commend him to the Ways and Means Committee in their struggle to find out what the words "United States" mean [laughter]—old Dr. Johnson, the Ursa Major of English literature, is said to have gone to see one widow every night for twenty years, and finally somebody said to him, "Why don't you marry her, Doctor?" He replied, "My dear sir, if I married her, where would I go to spend my evenings?" Force of habit. Just like the Philadelphia stuffing of ballot boxes. They say it is an absolute fact that that Republican city is so corrupt that when the man in the moon passes over it he holds his nose to keep from fainting. [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Chairman, I should like the gentleman to know that one lot of those ballot-box stuffers are in jail and every one of the others has skipped his bail, which has been forfeited; so that when the gentleman refers to the moral condition of Philadelphia, I want him to understand that the people there are still ready to see that what is right is done and that the men who break the laws are punished.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If all the ballot-box stuffers and heelers in Philadelphia were sent to the penitentiary the town would be depopulated. [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMS. Perhaps some of our ballot-box stuffers went to Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. There is not a State in the American Union that has a better election law than the State of Missouri. I drew it myself; I helped pass it through the legislature. In that imperial Commonwealth every man, black or white, rich or poor, votes once and has his vote counted once.

Mr. ADAMS. Yet we had a gentleman rise in his seat the other day and state that the election law in Missouri was such that it would be impossible to hold an honest election there. Did the gentleman from Missouri draw and pass that law?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. There is no such law. I will state what is the matter with the gentleman from St. Louis.

Mr. ADAMS. He is all right.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Wait a moment. The gentleman from Missouri represents a large German constituency.

Mr. ADAMS. That is good.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They are in favor of the Boers and against the Philippine propaganda. The gentleman from Missouri has been running with the McKinley Administration until his political fences have got into very bad order, and he thought he would recoup by getting up here and making a spread-eagle speech about the corruption of elections in St. Louis.

Mr. BARTHOLDT rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Oh, yes.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I made a dispassionate statement the other day——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, I did not hear it.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. It was made in a Republican caucus, and I do not intend to betray the secrets of a caucus. But I stand by every word I said—that the election law in our State is every bit as bad as, if not worse than, the law upon the statute books of the State of Kentucky which resulted the other day in bloodshed and murder. And I want to ask the gentleman a question in this connection. If he drew the election law of Missouri, he is probably aware of the fact that under that new law there will not be appointed in the city of St. Louis, nor in the city of Kansas City, a Republican either as judge of elections or as clerk; consequently the machinery is entirely in the hands of the Democracy——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Oh, no.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. So far as my own district is concerned——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Wait a moment. I yielded for a question; not for a speech. I want to make my speech myself.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. The gentleman referred to my State; will he allow me a word in this connection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. We will give you time when I get through. I want to go on with my speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri declines to yield further.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The judges of election under that law are politically about half and half; so are the clerks. That answers the gentleman's statement. The new law, of which he complains, is an amendment to the law which I helped pass. This new law has never been tried. Consequently, nobody knows whether it is good or bad. Anyway, it applies only to the large cities and is intended to prevent corruption.

I have stated one reason assigned by the imperialists why we should go out carrying the blessings of liberty to the ends of the earth. Another class of them say, "It is Providence." I have heard a good many bad things unloaded on Providence, but I never heard anything as bad as that. To claim that this is the work of Providence reminds one of the old colored brother who said he had observed that when he prayed that Providence would send him a chicken he never got it; but when he prayed that Providence would send him to the chicken he usually got there. [Laughter.]

Another thing to demonstrate our fitness to do political missionary work among the effete monarchies of the East: Five Southern States are now taxing their ingenuity to eliminate the colored brother from the political equation without infracting the Federal Constitution, and you Northern people would do precisely the same thing under the same circumstances.

In fact, the Congress of the United States has carried that plan further than any Southern State has done, for right under the shadow of this Capitol 300,000 citizens of the District of Columbia, white and black, are disfranchised by act of Congress and have no more voice in the government under which they live than so many stocks and stones.

Physician, heal thyself!

There was one candid imperialist. That was the immortal soldier and statesman, Frederick the Great. He took Silesia, to which his ancestors had some shadowy claim two hundred years before his day. Through the horrors of the seven years' war, in which he soundly thrashed the Russians, Austrians, and French combined, he resolutely held on to his prey. All Europe in arms could not tear Silesia from his iron grasp. When all was over and he stood forth victor over all his foes, in a state paper one of his ministers undertook to demonstrate that it was the will of God, whereupon candid, heroic Frederick growled, "Strike it out. Leave the name of God out of that. Say I did it."

Our imperialists are not so courageous as Frederick. A good many of them beat about the bush; but some do not. Living out West has a tendency to increase and encourage independence of character.

Senator CARTER of Montana took a whack at this business not long ago. Here is what he said:

> This is a practical age. We are going to deal with this question on the basis of dollars and cents. Neither religion nor sentiment will have much influence in determining the verdict. The great question will be, Will it pay? If we can show the country that it will, as I think we can, the American flag will never come down from the Philippines.

Mr. Chairman, when the Republican party was first organized it went forth to do battle against the intrenched powers of the land as the friend of humanity; and I do not believe that if Abraham Lincoln and the coterie of great men who gathered around him were here to-day they would be willing to write the dollar mark as the sign in which the American people shall conquer. [Applause.] "Will it pay?" Are you willing to fritter away the liberty of coming generations that a lot of jobbers may be permitted to rake in a few dollars in the Philippine Islands?

But take the matter as the Senator from Montana puts it—on the low and debasing standard of the almighty dollar—and let us see how we will come out. It is said that figures will not lie. Here they are: The appropriations for the Army, passed in the spring of 1898, just before the Cuban war began, were $23,129,344.30. The other day we passed an urgent deficiency bill carrying $47,602,032.61 for the Army. The regular appropriation bill for the Army carried $75,247,811, making a total of $122,849,843.61 for the Army alone. Deduct from that the appropriation for the fiscal year, made in the spring of 1898, under normal conditions, and you have $99,720,499.31 left as the cost of this imperial policy up to the present time for the Army alone.

That is the price of the Philippine war to date, exclusive of the increased expenditures for the Navy, exclusive of the awful waste of human life and human health, and exclusive of the expense of a long roll of pensioners, which our children to the third and fourth generation will not live long enough to see paid.

What have we to show for this immense expenditure of life and blood and tears and treasure? Nothing, absolutely nothing.

When will this war end? Can anybody predict the day, even approximately?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. DINSMORE. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri be allowed to complete his remarks without limit.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas can yield further time to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. DINSMORE. Well, I yield to him such time as he desires.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas yields to his colleague without limit, within the time that he possesses.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I thank my friend from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE], also the chairman of the committee [Mr. HITT], for their courtesy.

Mr. LACEY. Now that the gentleman's time has been extended, I want to ask him a question.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Very well.

Mr. LACEY. I understood the gentleman from Missouri, not long ago, to say that his party took the Republicans by the scruff of the neck and got them into this trouble.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I did not say any such thing. That speech of mine seems destined to be immortal. I will tell you what I said. I said that the Democratic party in this House took the Republican party by the scruff of the neck and dragged it into the Spanish war, and I stand by that statement. It is the truth of history. We did that very thing. But the Spanish war is not the Philippine war. You are simply making me say that a little sooner than I would have said it anyway. I wish to call the attention of lawyers to this fact:

The Constitution of the United States gives Congress the right to declare war. We declared it. You Republicans came in under a good deal of pressure. You had a "kickers'" caucus around here that had eighty-five members in it, I have understood. At last you came in with a declaration of the Spanish war that Congress had the right to declare, that Congress did declare, and Congress carried that war to a glorious conclusion. And I say now that if that war had done nothing else except to give George Dewey and Winfield Scott Schley to immortality it is worth all that it cost.

But this war is not the Spanish war. It is not part of the Spanish war. Congress never authorized it, and Congress should stop it.

Mr. LACEY. I understood my friend was giving us a list of appropriations for the year 1898.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I gave you that as the last normal appropriation of the War Department.

Mr. LACEY. Immediately before the Spanish war.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes; and it was an appropriation made when nobody expected that there would be a war.

Now, I want to stir up your pure minds by way of remembrance. We went into that Spanish war with the solemn resolution of Congress that it was not for imperial aggrandizement or to enlarge our territory. What did we do that for, do you suppose? Did we do it because we had nothing else to do? Was it just a mere empty flourish of rhetoric? No; I will tell you what we put it in there for. For two reasons. In the first place, you never would have got a resolution through this Congress declaring war in the world if it had not been put in there, because there were enough of us here who dreaded this very thing to prevent it.

In the second place, we put it in there to secure the good opinion of mankind, to keep the old nations of the earth from getting scared at this lusty young giant of the West, and it did keep them off; and if anybody had had any idea that an attempt would have been made to confine that resolution to Cuba, it would have been put into that resolution so broad that it would have covered every foot of land on the face of God's footstool.

We are in a nice fix, are we not? There is one other gentleman about whom I wish to express my opinion. A man stood up in the Senate of the United States not long ago and held up before the twinkling eyes of the members of the House of the Ancients a piece of glittering gold that he alleged he had picked up in the Philippine Islands, and said, in substance, "There are mountains of it over there, and for that reason we should go and dispossess the people and take their land."

Mr. Chairman, the junior Senator from Colorado did not overstep the mark when he denounced that speech as "base and sordid," and I will give my opinion of it in another way. There is scarcely a convicted thief in any penitentiary of any civilized country on the globe who did not land behind the bars by reason of just such temptation as the gentleman from the Wabash held up before the Senate of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, they quoted Scripture here the other day. I want to quote a little myself. It is written, "Judge a tree by its fruits." That is good gospel. It was wisdom before it was ever put in the Bible. What are the fruits of imperialism up to date? I am not going to overstate the case at all. In the first place, it has led us into abandoning the Declaration of Independence, which has made us what we are and glorified us in the eyes of the whole world. That is the first proposition.

Now, gentlemen, I have philosophized a good deal about that document. I want to say this to you. There is nothing new in the Declaration of Independence except two propositions, and they revolutionized this world. One of them is that all men are created equal; the other is that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. What did those two propositions do? Why, they made us a republic. They made all of North America a republic, except the British possessions. They made Central America a bevy of republics; they made South America republican. They made two republics in Europe and four in Africa, and gave liberty to the islands of the sea, and we did it. Mark Twain says, "Blessed is the man that bloweth his own horn, lest it shall not be blown." We did it. There is not a republic existing on earth to-day that does not exist by reason of our example and the twin propositions in the Declaration of Independence that all men are created equal and that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed.

I never think about the condition of the world now that I do not bless God for the men who wrote the Declaration of Independence and for the men under Washington who made it good on a thousand battlefields. Think of what a Republican Secretary of State did. When Louis Napoleon, the lucky adventurer, took possession of Mexico, at a time when his arms glittered from China to Peru, when we got through with our family fight the first thing that the Secretary of State did was to notify him to get out of Mexico and not to stand on the order of his going, and he went; and Mexico exists to-day by reason of our patriotism, our courage, and our good sense.

But some fellow somewhere will get up and say that it is not true that all men are created equal; that one man is 6 high, another one only 5; that one man has the brain of a Webster and another is an idiot; one is black and another is white. Well, it never meant any such thing as that. It meant that every child is born into this world with the same political rights as any other child.

Latter-day Republicans sneer at the Declaration of Independence as composed of glittering generalities and barren idealities, not fit to be considered seriously by fin de siècle statesmen. Any man who asserts that it really means something, that it is the major charta of our liberties, that it contains the argument not only for our Revolution but for all representative government, is rated by these practical statesmen as a sickly sentimentalist.

Let me read you the words of a man famous for common sense wherever civilization abounds:

> I never had a feeling politically that did not spring from the sentiments embodied in the Declaration of Independence. * * * Now, my friends, can this country be saved upon this basis? If it can, I shall consider myself one of the happiest men in the world if I can help to save it. If it can not be saved upon that principle, it will be truly awful. But if this country can not be saved without giving up that principle, I was about to say I would rather be assassinated on this spot than surrender it.

Who do you suppose said that? Abraham Lincoln, the best product of Kentucky's fertile soil. When and where did he utter those memorable words which are a condemnation of all the jingoes in the land? In 1861, in Independence Hall, a place sacred to lovers of liberty everywhere.

Again he said:

> What constitutes the bulwark of our own liberty and independence? It is not our frowning battlements, our bristling seacoasts, our Army, or our Navy. These are not our reliances against danger. All of these may be turned against us without making us weaker for the struggle. Our reliance is in the love of liberty which God has planted in us. Our defense is in the spirit which prizes liberty as the heritage of all men in all lands, everywhere. Destroy this spirit and you have planted the seed of despotism at your own doors. Familiarize yourself with the chains of bondage and you prepare your own limbs to wear them. Accustomed to trample on the rights of others, you have lost the strength of your own independence and become the fit subjects of the first cunning tyrant who rises among you.

Still again he said:

> No man is good enough to govern another man without that other's consent. When the white man governs himself, that is self-government; but when he governs himself and also governs another man, that is more than self-government—that is despotism. Our reliance is in the love of liberty which God has planted in us; our defense is in the spirit which prizes liberty as the heritage of all men, in all lands, everywhere. They who deny freedom to others deserve it not for themselves, and under a just God can not long retain it.

As if endowed with prophetic power to see what would be happening here in 1900, Mr. Lincoln, at Lewiston, Me., said, in 1858.

> Wise statesmen as they were, they knew the tendency of prosperity to breed tyrants; and so they established these great self-evident truths, that when in the distant future some man, some faction, some interest, should set up the doctrine that none but rich men, or none but white men, or none but Anglo-Saxon white men, were entitled to liberty and the pursuit of happiness, their posterity might look up again to the Declaration of Independence and take courage to renew the battle which their fathers began. * * * so that no man should thereafter dare to limit and circumscribe the principles on which the temple of liberty was being built.

Those words seem spoken to describe our imperialists, who sneer at the Declaration of Independence and its authors.

Republicans are fond of tracing their political pedigree to Alexander Hamilton, who condemned their present performances in these words:

> National liberty is a gift of the beneficent Creator to the whole human race; and the civil liberty is founded on that, and can not be wrested from any people without the most manifest violation of justice.

Charles Sumner was once considered a great prophet in Republican Israel, and the popular voice endowed him with all the virtues of martyrdom. In an unguarded moment he said:

> The words that "governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed" are sacred words, full of life-giving energy. Not simply national independence was here proclaimed, but also the primal rights of all mankind.

His illustrious successor in the Senate, the learned and venerable GEORGE FRISBIE HOAR, is now denounced as a traitor by cheap-John demagogues because he expresses sentiments similar to those of Sumner.

Sneer at the great Declaration and its self-evident truths, do you? Here are a few pearls of thought and patriotism culled at random from the archives of the Republican party in its better days:

> Resolved, That the principle promulgated in the Declaration of Independence is essential to the preservation of our republican institutions.—Republican platform of June 17, 1856.
>
> Resolved, That the maintenance of the principles promulgated in the Declaration of Independence, that governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed, is essential to the preservation of our republican institutions.—Republican platform of May 17, 1860.
>
> Resolved, This convention declares itself in sympathy with all oppressed people who are struggling for their rights. We recognize the great principles laid down in the immortal Declaration of Independence as the true foundation of democratic government, and we hail with gladness every effort toward making these principles a living reality on every inch of American soil.—Republican platform of May 20, 1868.
>
> Resolved, That the Republican party has always been the champion of the oppressed and recognized the dignity of manhood, irrespective of faith, color, or nationality. It sympathizes with the cause of home rule in Ireland.—Republican platform of June 19, 1892.

Really, some Anglomaniac ought to move to strike out sympathy for Ireland and insert sympathy for John Bull in the awful but righteous trouncing he is just now receiving at the hands of Oom Paul Kruger.

But, gentlemen, we do not have to confine ourselves to quotations from the dead statesmen and to musty platforms in the years agone. There is an eminent, I may say preeminent, Republican jingo statesman now living—not only living, but living in clover—who not long since publicly and solemnly gave in his adhesion to the doctrines of the Declaration and with prophetic power condemned the present Philippine policy of the Administration. His name is William McKinley. He resideth in the White House. He hath offices galore to distribute to the faithful. But in a moment of temporary aberration he uttered these treasonable words:

> I speak not of forcible annexation, for that, under our code of morals, would be criminal aggression.

Some supple-jack of a jingo ought to move to expunge those words from the records of the country and from human memory.

TESTIMONY OF A GREAT MISSOURIAN.

I will quote a few pregnant sentences lately spoken by a great Missouri Republican, now a resident of Washington, Gen. John B. Henderson. I like to quote Republicans when they talk wisdom and patriotism. John B. Henderson is one of the greatest lawyers ever in either branch of Congress. He was a brigadier-general in the Union Army, a Senator of the United States for eight years, President of the convention which nominated Blaine, and president of the Pan-American Congress. He is the only man, living or dead, that ever refused a place on the supreme court bench of Missouri. He rendered his country and his party conspicuous service by having conscience, courage, brains, and patriotism enough to vote for the acquittal of Andrew Johnson, to prosecute the whisky ring even unto death, and to help defeat General Grant for a third term.

It will not do for gentlemen to sneer at General Henderson when he says:

For what purpose, then, are we conquering the Philippine people? And how are they to be governed when passed under the yoke of subjugation? These are the great questions which sooner or later we must solve for ourselves, and which the Philippine people have propounded to our rulers, beginning with the President and going down to the captains of companies, whose only reply has been to mow them down by thousands with the destructive arms of modern science. Shall these people be citizens of the United States, free to come and go from State to State? Shall they be governed by local legislatures of their own selection, represented in the Federal Congress, and clothed with all the rights of American freemen? Tell them this and the war will close in an hour. To tell them less is to deny the theory of our own Government, to subvert the foundations of American liberty, and to enter upon a system of imperialism as fatal and as corrupting to the governing power as is personal slavery to the master.

From these people we have concealed the records of our political history. We hide from ourselves, as we hide from them, the judicial interpretations of our own Constitution, and tell them with brazen front that the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution itself are but glittering generalities intended for the strong and not for the weak.

EVIDENCE OF AN EMINENT REPUBLICAN STATESMAN.

I now quote from a man who is admired and beloved by all friends of liberty wherever domiciled. His name is Carl Schurz. "To name him is to praise him." Born in Germany, he was one of that band of noble revolutionists who in 1848 strove heroically to make Europe free. He came to this country to find here that liberty which was unattainable there. The friend and confidant of Lincoln, he became a major-general, minister to Spain, Senator of the United States from Missouri, and Secretary of the Interior. He is universally recognized as a man of conscience, of courage, of brains, of learning, and of eloquence. At the age of three-score and ten he is still a great tribune of the people and an active friend of human freedom. I commend his words of wisdom to all who hear or read this speech. In speaking of the possibility of new States from our newly acquired territory, he says:

In Puerto Rico, for instance, politicians of lively ambition are already clamoring for the speedy organization of that island as a regular Territory, soon to be admitted as a State of the Union. You may say that they will have long to wait. Be not so sure of that. Consult your own experience. Has not more than one Territory, hardly fitted for statehood, been precipitated into the Union as a State when the majority party in Congress thought that by doing so its party strength could be augmented in the Senate and in the House and in the electoral college? Have our parties become so unselfishly virtuous that this may not happen again? So we may see Puerto Rico admitted before we have had time to rub our eyes.

You may say that little Puerto Rico would not matter much. But can any clear-thinking man believe that when we are once fairly started in the course of indiscriminate expansion we shall stop there? Will not the same reasons which induced us to take Puerto Rico also be used to show that the two islands of Santo Domingo, with Haiti, and of Cuba, which separate Puerto Rico from our coast, would, if they were in foreign hands, be a danger to us and that we must take them? Nothing could be more plausible. Why, the necessity of annexing Santo Domingo is already freely discussed, and agencies to bring this about are actually at work. And as to Cuba, every expansionist will tell you that it is only a matter of time. And does anyone believe that those islands, if annexed, will not become States of this Union? That would give us at least three, perhaps four, new States, with about 3,500,000 inhabitants—Spanish and French Creoles and negroes—with six or eight Senators and from fifteen to twenty Representatives in Congress, and a corresponding number of votes in the electoral college.

Nor are we likely to stop there. If we build and own the Nicaragua Canal, instead of neutralizing it, we shall easily persuade ourselves that our control of that canal will not be safe unless we own all the country down to it, so that it be not separated from our borders by any foreign, and possibly hostile power. Is this too adventurous an idea to become true? Why, it is not half as adventurous and extravagant as the idea of uniting to this Republic the Philippines, 9,000 miles away. It is already proposed to acquire in some way strips of territory several miles wide on each side of that canal for its military protection. But that will certainly be found insufficient if foreign countries lie between. We must, therefore, have those countries. That means Mexico and various small Central American republics, with a population in all of about 14,000,000, mostly Spanish-Indian mixture—making at least 15 States, entitled to 30 Senators and scores of Representatives and Presidential electors.

As to the character of the people whom those Senators, Members, and Presidential electors are to represent, I will let an authority speak that may astonish you, considering his present position—the Hon. Whitelaw Reid, who said in a public address at the time when the annexation of Santo Domingo was under discussion:

"This land greed of the Anglo-Saxon race is still at work. We have absorbed the best part of Mexico, but we have plenty of propagandists, mainly in the Army, and with influential voice near the head of the Government, clamorous for the rest. We have taken a foothold in the West Indies; it will be of God's mercy if we do not find the whole West Indian Archipelago crowded upon us to tax an already overloaded digestion. What are we to do with the turbulent, treacherous, ill-conditioned population? They have shown no faculty for self-government hitherto; and are we to precipitate them in a mass into the already sufficiently degraded elements of our national suffrage? We are trying the powers of Anglo-Saxon self-governing digestion upon 3,000,000 slaves; are the gastric juices of the body politic equal to the addition of the Mexicans, the Santo Domingans, the Cubans, the 'Conks' of the Bahamas, the Kanakas, and the rest of the inferior mixed races of our outlying tropical and semi-tropical dependencies?"

I could stand here till midnight and make quotations to show that in our present attitude, defending the Declaration of Independence, we occupy the position held by all the statesmen of all parties prior to the beginning of the Philippine war, and that the jingoes are propagating theories to which the great and good among our public men would never have subscribed; but there is no use to waste my strength and consume your time.

Another thing. Name the Constitution to one of these imperialists, and what answer do you get? Why, Gen. Wesley Merritt blurted out, what most of you were thinking, that "the Constitution is played out, it is not even worth discussing."

They sneer at Washington's Farewell Address, that everybody, including Mr. McKinley himself, has acknowledged as containing the wisdom of the world. Abandon the Monroe doctrine—that is what imperialism means—at once and without a struggle; because it stands to reason and to nature that we can not play the dog in the manger on this continent and at the same time colonize in the Eastern Hemisphere. Let us take another thing which has been done and which has been applauded by the public conscience. The other day, in a ground swell of virtue, this House rose in its might and took Brigham H. Roberts by the nape of the neck and slack of the trousers and set him out in the cold, cold world. [Laughter.]

Now, why, gentlemen? Because he had three wives; but the real argument against Roberts was never stated on this floor, and that was that it invaded the Democratic doctrine of equal rights to all and special privileges to none. [Renewed laughter.] But we performed that very virtuous act when we put him out because he had three wives, although Brigham H. Roberts was a Democrat. Now, this Republican Administration goes into an agreement or treaty—I do not care what they call it, but some kind of a paper—by which it takes into the employment of the United States Government that eminent Republican officeholder, the Sultan of Sulu, who has 300 wives. [Laughter.] Now, we Democrats, we virtuous Democrats——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. And we pay him tribute.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes; I will tell you about that in a few moments. We virtuous Democrats joined with you virtuous Republicans and put out of this House a polygamous Democrat. Now, as one good turn deserves another, I ask you virtuous Republicans to join hands with us virtuous Democrats and not admit within the American Union that eminent Republican officeholder, the Sultan of Sulu. [Laughter.] What are you doing? You are paying him $250 a month and you are paying his dato, Murah Jara, $75 a month. What are the duties of Murah Jara? Why, he is the keeper of the Sultan's harem [laughter]; and if you go on with this thing no Republican statesman will be properly equipped for a seat in the American Congress unless he has a harem and a keeper of his harem. [Great laughter.] I believe in having one wife, and I never saw what anybody wanted with more, and I am teetotally opposed to me or my people helping pay a part of the salary of the keeper of anybody's harem.

Let us see another thing about it, because it is all here. What are we doing now? Paying tribute to a petty tyrant. That is the plain fact. You can not wriggle out of it; that is what it is—paying tribute to a petty despot for the privilege of running the American flag up on the strawstack he inhabits as his palace. [Great laughter.] When did an American President ever pay tribute before? I will tell you. George Washington had to, because he could not help it. John Adams did it for the same reason; but when Thomas Jefferson came in, the only red-headed President of the United States [laughter and applause]—and in that connection, if the color of a man's hair has anything to do with his deeds, it is high time that another red-headed man should become President [renewed laughter]—he refused to pay tribute to the Barbary pirates, and ordered a Democratic lieutenant of the United States Navy to shell them out of their holes, which he did, and that was the end of the United States paying tribute at the Straits of Gibraltar or anywhere else.

Now, in the closing year of the nineteenth century, if not the first of the twentieth, the President of the United States, the President of 75,000,000 of people, pledged himself to pay this tribute to a petty despot whose very name you do not know. How do they justify it? Why, President Schurman has admitted in his declaration that it includes slavery and polygamy both. Schurman made defense of it. What reason do you think he gave? He said, "They tolerated slavery and they tolerated polygamy because these things were a part of their religion."

Now, my brothers, did not Brigham H. Roberts stand in this very House and justify his position on the ground that it was a part of his religion? Did he not? What else did Schurman say? He said the kind of slavery they have over there is a very mild form, a sort of patriarchal institution. Did you ever hear that kind of talk before? You young men never did, but the older men here know that that was precisely the defense that the people of twelve or thirteen States of the American Union made, that African slavery was a mild form, a sort of patriarchal institution. We are coming to it again. Verily, the whirligig of time brings its own revenges.

Now, I want somebody to answer this question. If polygamy is wrong in the United States, is it right in Asia? Is it? The last Democratic President of the United States, James Buchanan, sent an army to thrash the Mormons in Utah. The latest Republican President of the United States, and, let us hope, the last, enters into some kind of an agreement—they say it is not a treaty—with a polygamist of the Sulu Islands. I submit that if Brigham Young was a criminal for having 26 wives, the Sultan of Sulu is a greater criminal for having 300 wives. [Laughter.] Did you ever hear of the question of slavery and what it did? For four long years it made this country red with the best blood of the nation because some people thought other people should not buy and sell human flesh. But I submit that what is wrong in America is not right in Asia. And if it is wrong for an American citizen to own a black African, it is wrong for anybody to own a brown Asiatic.

Now, one other thing. How do you like this paying of tribute? I do not believe you people like it any better than I do. Do you know what was the first infallible sign of the decline and fall of the Roman Empire? It was paying tribute to barbarians. Armies destroyed might be replaced, cities razed might be rebuilt, but when the insatiable barbarian got the first taste of Roman tribute he never stopped until his whiskered pandours and fierce hussars rode through the vine-clad hills of Italy and fed their horses in the temples of the Romans of the seven-hilled city.

Let us see another thing that this imperialism has brought us to—a press censorship. These are the fruits of the tree of forbidden knowledge. A press censorship! Do you know what was the only party that ever established a press censorship in this country? It was the old Federalist party. It passed a law making it a crime to speak disrespectfully of the President of the United States, or of the Vice-President, or of the Supreme Court, or of the Senate or House of Representatives, or any member thereof. Good heavens! Just think of it! Suppose that law had been on the statute book during the last two years of Cleveland's second Administration; where would we have been? Every man jack of us would have been in prison and not one would have escaped. [Laughter.] Yes, on both sides of the House. [Laughter.] Suppose that was the law now; where would a good many of us be? In durance vile.

But in 1800 the American people arose in their wrath and might and hurled the old Federalist party from power and buried it in a grave upon which there is inscribed, "No resurrection;" and if the Republican party in the United States persists in this press censorship it will follow the old Federalist party in the broad and dusty pathway to oblivion.

Another bitter fruit of the tree of imperialism is that it makes our Government callous to the Macedonian cry which comes to us from other peoples who are fighting for the right to govern themselves.

The love of freedom is not confined to any latitude or longitude. Wherever people are struggling for liberty they should have the friendship of all Americans.

It is astounding that there should be any argument as to that proposition within the broad confines of this puissant Republic. Two years ago there would not have been; but a change, a marvelous change, has come over the spirit of our dream.

In the elder day we would have made the welkin ring; now, officially speaking, we are dumb as oysters. Wherefore? Because England is a robber nation; we are ambitious to become a robber nation; and all robber nations must stand together for self-protection; and because it is so English, don't you know!

That's official America, mark you—only official America.

From its sordid and inhuman verdict we appeal to the unofficial masses, who make and unmake statesmen, the great body of our citizenship, whom Abraham Lincoln affectionately denominated "the plain people"—yes, the plain people, the honest people, the uncorrupted people, who do not covet their neighbor's land, whose eyes are not blinded by the sheen of their neighbor's gold, whose cupidity is not excited by the sparkle of their neighbor's diamonds, who do not believe that larceny, burglary, arson, and murder are fundamentals of political economy and Christian civilization, and in whose pure and tender hearts the sweet song of human freedom is forever singing.

The Senate of the United States may laugh to scorn Senator MASON'S resolution of sympathy with the Boers, but the toiling millions of America will send their sympathy and their hearty Godspeed across the sea to the brave burghers who are the best marksmen seen on earth since Andrew Jackson's immortal day at New Orleans.

Why should we not sympathize with these sturdy defenders of their liberty, their homes, their wives, and their little children? They are in the right. Not only that—they have five times as much cause for fighting as our fathers had in 1775.

Daniel Webster once declared that our Revolutionary sires went to war about a preamble; but if that be true, it is also true that the essence of that preamble was the right of self-government, for which the Boers are fighting.

Twice they have abandoned their humble homes and removed into the wilderness to get rid of the English; but the villain still pursues them.

Why should we not express our sympathy?

The precedents all favor such action.

We passed resolutions of sympathy with the Greeks, when struggling heroically to break the yoke of the unspeakable Turk, and in advocacy of those resolutions Daniel Webster established his fame as an orator by his lofty and impassioned appeal to the moral sentiment of the world—the same sentiment which we now invoke in behalf of an oppressed and long-suffering people.

Under the lead of that matchless Kentuckian, Henry Clay, we hastened to express our sympathy with the nascent South American republics, thereby assisting them to throw off their Spanish chains; and we did our duty by that act.

We did these things when we were a feeble folk.

Then we were willing to defy the world, the flesh, and the devil to aid anybody anywhere struggling for freedom.

Now, that we are so strong that we can not estimate our strength, we have fallen to the low estate of being John Bull's silent partner in butchering and despoiling white men—flesh of our flesh and bone of our bone—fighting valiantly and gloriously for their altars and their fires. Shame upon such a craven spirit!

If gold and diamonds had never been discovered in grand old Paul Kruger's bailiwick, there would have been no war. It is the Boers' gold and diamonds that the English are fighting for, and not the rights of the Utlanders. Any weak people discovering gold, diamonds, or anything of value may expect a visit from Mr. Bull.

I hope he will get his fill of gold. I hope it from the bottom of my heart. I want him to get it as Crassus got it.

He waged a war against the Parthians to gobble their gold. They defeated his legions, cut off his head, poured melted gold down his dead throat, and, in derision, said: "Now, Crassus, thou hast thy gold!"

So may it be with Johnny Bull in South Africa and to all who are the foes of human liberty.

I do not wish to weary the House, but there is another branch of this matter I want to mention briefly. This appetite for islands grows with what it feeds on. When we took in the Sandwich Islands I said then it was only the beginning of the end.

Now we have the Sandwich Islands; we have the island of Guam; we have Puerto Rico; we intend to swallow Cuba at the first opportunity; we are reaching out for the Philippines. One day two weeks ago the Philadelphia Inquirer had an editorial advocating the purchase by the United States of the Danish West India Islands—St. John, St. Croix, and St. Thomas. The very same day the Philadelphia North American had an editorial advocating the proposition that we buy the Galapagos Islands. Now, I undertake to say, unless you have rubbed up your geography lately, there is not a man in the House who would know which way to start—north, south, east, or west—if required to start instantly for the Galapagos Islands.

One other proposition. They say that where the American flag has once been raised it shall never be hauled down. The President of the United States said that. My friend from Ohio, General GROSVENOR, is the originator of that absurd theory. A more preposterous one was never hatched in the brain of man. I do not believe that the President had any more intention of making that speech when he started South than I have of undertaking to fly. But he got down there among the Southern people; they are warm-hearted, hospitable, generous, enthusiastic, feather-headed, and they sometimes boil over. [Laughter.] I love the Southrons with all the intensity of my being; for blood is thicker than water. When he got down there, with his engaging personality and handsome presence, it was such a relief from Cleveland that they went wild in their enthusiasm; and, as the newspapers stated, he interpolated that clause into his written speech at the banquet when it was past midnight—"Who shall haul down the American flag? Men of Dixie, will you haul it down?" Of course they swore by the horns of the altar that they would not haul it down. [Laughter.] And in their then excited frame of mind and exaltation of spirit, they would have sworn just as cheerfully and vociferously to storm the gates of hell or scale the mountains of the moon.

Now, I have not attended very many banquets; I have attended a few; but my opinion is that the poorest place on the American continent to ascertain the cool, deliberate, settled judgment of the American people is at a banquet, especially in the South at 2 o'clock in the morning "betwixt the walnuts and the wine." [Laughter.]

Now, let us see where this doctrine would land us. The proposition is that we are not going to haul down the American flag. Did any Roman emperors ever haul down their flag? Adrian, one of the greatest of them, hauled it down, and everybody has applauded him since.

There used to be a man named Napoleon Bonaparte, who roamed around a good deal away from home. [Laughter.] He may be called the most masterful flag raiser of that age. He ran up the French flag on every capital of Europe except London, and I have always been sorry he did not run it up there. Did he always keep his flag up where he first put it? Why, bless your souls, no. He pulled it down at Berlin, at Vienna, at Madrid, and—I was about to say a thousand other places. He took the French eagles back to their eyrie on the banks of the Seine. If my friend General GROSVENOR had been there he would have said, "Sire, you will sully your reputation. Where the French flag has once waved it must wave—

"Forever and forever,
As long as the river flows,
As long as the heart has passions,
As long as life hath woes."

And when Victoria, Louis Napoleon, and the Sultan of Turkey went into the Crimean war Queen Vic got into rather bad company on both sides. They ran up their flags on Russian soil. Did they keep them there? No; they pulled them down, and were glad to have an opportunity to pull them down and go home. If they had not done so Kinglake's history of the Crimean war would have contained so many volumes that the world would not have held them.

Does England always keep her flag up where she has hoisted it? She had floated it over every capital of Europe except that of Russia. She once floated it over the Philippines, but pulled it down again. On a day that no American can remember except with shame and humiliation the British burned this Capitol, and over its ruins ran up the cross of St. George. Did they keep it there? No. If they had undertaken to keep it there, what would have happened? Why, every boy and half the girls born in the United States since that time would have died in the attempt to haul down that hateful rag.

Let us recur to our own history. Have we always kept our flag where we ran it up? Why, sir, we ran it up on the river Thames, in Canada. One of my kinsmen died on that battlefield running up that flag. We ran up our flag over the halls of the Montezumas, in Mexico; we ran it up on the walls of the Barbary powers, in Africa. Did we keep it up? No; when it had answered the purposes for which it was put up we pulled it down and brought it back into our own country, and have been stronger and better ever since for doing so.

Let me tell you something further about running up the flag and hauling it down. To say that you will never haul down the flag from any place where it has once been hoisted, means a war of extermination inevitably.

When John A. Dix at the beginning of the civil war telegraphed, "If any man undertakes to haul down the American flag, shoot him on the spot," it fired the patriotic heart of the land, because that flag was floating where it ought to float. But whenever you run it up where it has got no business, it ceases to be the banner of the free and the emblem of liberty and becomes to the people where it is run up an emblem of slavery and humiliation.

Now, gentlemen, I must stop, of course. But one other thing I want to suggest to you. It is not pleasant to play the rôle of Cassandra, but people ought to learn by experience.

Why will we learn nothing from the sad fate of those who have gone before? I had an uncle somewhat given to wild ways. My father, an older man, advised him to profit by the experience of others. "Oh," replied the ardent youth, "I want to experience these things myself." We are acting in precisely the same reckless manner. Strong beyond computation, happier than any other people on earth, growing by leaps and bounds, yet with the history of the world for six thousand years before our faces we are hastening with flying feet into that broad and easy pathway whose end is death.

Take a few from the innumerable examples which history furnishes for our instruction—examples authenticated beyond all cavil.

Greece was the first great nation of Europe. As long as she was contented to remain within the bounds which nature fixed for her she flourished, the home of art, poetry, learning, commerce, and valor. But Greece was not big enough for Alexander, who, not satisfied with being the son of Philip of Macedonia, boasted that he was Ammon's son. So he started out to slaughter, to conquer, and to seek universal dominion. We certainly can not hope to beat him at his own game. You know what befell him. But where be the cities now which he founded? Where the empire which he created? the glory of his own country, which he debauched, ruined, and enslaved?

Then Rome arose upon the banks of the yellow Tiber; waxed strong, spread out till Rome was synonymous with the civilized world; lorded it over all creation for some centuries; broke to pieces of her own weight and own rottenness; became the victim of the cruel barbarian and followed Greece to the graveyard of nations.

"In the second century of the Christian Era the Empire of Rome comprehended the fairest part of the earth and the most civilized portion of mankind. The frontiers of that extensive monarchy were guarded by ancient renown and disciplined valor." Those are the splendid sentences with which Edward Gibbon opens The History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, the saddest story in the annals of the human ra e. Dull indeed must be the man, cold must be his heart, whose imagination, fired by those two glowing and gorgeous sentences, does not conjure up for his contemplation magnificent pictures of human happiness and human prosperity. But, alas! the six large volumes which he wrote are almost exclusively devoted to giving a melancholy, a heart-rending history of human folly, human depravity, human weakness, human misery, and human poltroonery, such as can be found nowhere else in the entire realm of literature.

Here and there a flash of genius, an act of patriotism, a deed of humanity, a feat of heroism, lights up the somber scene of desolation and woe—only the last flickerings of the expiring candle. Constantly, forever downward, the great historian leads our steps, through suffering and decay, from the accession of Augustus Cæsar to the fall of Constantinople—scenes twelve hundred years apart, but welded together for our instruction and our warning. The end may be described succinctly as "Darkness everywhere; chaos come again."

I wish most fervently that every citizen of this Republic could be compelled to read carefully and prayerfully Gibbon's stupendous work. It would wound the jingoes past all surgery, give the coup de grâce to imperialism on this continent, and save our children from a fate at the contemplation of whose horrors even the bravest of us must shudder.

Over and over and over again he tells us with an emphasis which can never be forgotten that "the decline and fall of the Roman Empire" was caused by the failure of the successors of Augustus to follow the sage advice of that crafty statesman to keep the empire within safe, reasonable, and natural bounds. With their evil example and its awful consequences before our eyes, we seem determined to plunge headlong into the black and bottomless abyss in which they disappeared forever from human ken.

If you desire a poetical description of Rome after their folly and wickedness had wrought their perfect work of destruction, read the famous lines of Lord Byron, the greatest poet that ever lived:

O Rome! my country! city of the soul!
The orphans of the heart must turn to thee,
Lone mother of dead empires! and control
In their shut breasts their petty misery.
What are our woes and sufferance? Come and see
The cypress, hear the owl, and plod your way
O'er steps of broken thrones and temples, Ye!
Whose agonies are evils of a day—
A world is at our feet as fragile as our clay.

The Niobe of nations! there she stands,
Childless and crownless, in her voiceless woe;
An empty urn within her wither'd hands,
Whose holy dust was scatter'd long ago;
The Scipios' tomb contains no ashes now;
The very sepulchers lie tenantless
Of their heroic dwellers: dost thou flow,
Old Tiber! through a marble wilderness?
Rise, with thy yellow waves, and mantle her distress.

The Goth, the Christian, Time, War, Flood, and Fire,
Have dealt upon the seven-hill'd city's pride;
She saw her glories star by star expire,
And up the steep barbarian monarchs ride,
Where the car climb'd the Capitol; far and wide
Temple and tower went down, nor left a site—
Chaos of ruins! who shall trace the void,
O'er the dim fragments cast a lunar light,
And say, "Here was, or is," where all is double night?

The double night of ages, and of her,
Night's daughter, Ignorance, hath wrapp'd, and wrap
All round us; we but feel our way to err;
The ocean hath its chart, the stars their map,
And Knowledge spreads them on her ample lap;
But Rome is as the desert, where we steer
Stumbling o'er recollections; now we clap
Our hands, and cry, "Eureka!" it is clear—
When but some false mirage of ruin rises near.

Then came Mohammed, camel driver and prophet, with the Koran in one hand and the sword in the other, and founded in blood and on fanaticism an empire which spread until it looked as though it were to be universal; but on the field of Tours and under the walls of Vienna Charles Martel and John Sobieski rolled back the tide of Saracen invasion, which has been receding ever since, until the latest of his successors is the laughing-stock of royalty, and "the Sick Man of Europe" is permitted to play at being a monarch only because the great powers can not agree as to who shall own Constantinople, the key to the eastern world.

At the astounding historic pageant at Brussels, when Charles V, weary of glory, of power, of conquest, and of the world, abdicated in favor of Philip II, he could with perfect truth have made the proud boast which Daniel Webster made for England, that the sun never set upon his dominions and that his morning drumbeat encircled the globe. Not only Spain was his, but also Italy, Sicily, Austria, the Netherlands, the Floridas, most of North, Central, and South America, and nearly all the islands of all the seas. Even the great highway of the ocean was denominated the Spanish Main. But his immense and glittering empire was an unnatural, an incongruous, an incoherent, an incompatible conglomeration of states, and only last year we, who as a nation were in our swaddling clothes when that great Emperor doffed his crown and betook him to a monastery, gave the finish to his abnormal empire.

Next came Louis XIV, the Grand Monarque, who was King for seventy-two years; who for half a century did bestride this narrow world like a Colossus; who, in the plenitude of his power, dreamed that he could defy the immutable laws of nature and by a family compact could give the earth and the fullness thereof in fee simple to his descendants; whose old age was made bitter by Blenheim, Oudenarde, Ramillies, and Malplaquet, by the loss of armies, battles, and provinces; whose cup of humiliation was filled to overflowing by the invasion of La Belle France; whose grandson died upon the block, and whose heirs are mere phantom kings—wanderers and vagabonds upon the face of the earth.

Close upon his august heels came the marvelous Corsican, the wonderful warrior, the self-styled "Armed Soldier of Democracy," who boasted that he found the crown of France in the gutter, picked it up on the point of his sword, and with his own hands clapped it upon his own head. Had he been warned by the fate of his predecessors, he would have died upon the throne, left it to his son, and in history would have been named "Napoleon the Invincible." Not so, however. Filled with the vain lust of universal dominion, he, too, caught the fatal mania of imperialism. He conquered kingdoms, empires, and principalities. He deposed kings and queens and potentates until Europe was full of fleeing royalties. He made queens of his sisters, kings of his brothers, brothers-in-law, and even of his stable boys. In his vainglory he called his baby heir by the high-sounding title of King of Rome; but in an evil hour for him—a blessed hour for humanity—he, too, ran up against the inexorable law of nature; his legions perished in the snows of Russia, and at last, a prisoner on a tropic isle, he died in a delirium, shouting, "Tête d'armée!"

At last appeared John Bull as the great practitioner of the fatal theory of imperialism. He gobbled North America, a portion of South America, a large slice of Asia, most of northern Africa, the majority of all the islands in the bosom of the multitudinous seas. John was the greatest imperialist of them all. He had a long and successful run. At last he butted his hard head against Spion Kop and lost his glory in the Modder River. Many men hope and more believe that John has reached his highest point and hastes now to his setting, and that in South Africa, at the hands of old Paul Kruger, he will find his Waterloo.

Unless we are the veriest idiots upon whom God has showered his blessings, rich and manifold, we will profit by the dreadful example of these and others who have gone to ruin by the fatal process of imperialism.

Oh, yes; but they ask if Jefferson did not expand. Of course he did on rational principles. I am not against expansion on rational principles and in proper directions. I am to-day in favor of taking every foot of the British North American possessions. [Applause on the Democratic side.] They join our territory. Their people are educated in self-government. We would welcome them as citizens, and we would then not have John Bull for our nearest neighbor. Jefferson expanded, and I thank God that he was President in 1803, for if he had not been we never would have had the trans-Mississippi country. We needed it in our business. It was necessary for our healthy growth and for our perpetuity. It was contiguous territory. It had nobody in it except the Indians, whom we intended to kill, and a few white people who wanted to come with us. That is the truth. But even Napoleon, who can not be counted among the friends of liberty, stipulated that the Louisiana purchase should be admitted as a State or States and the people thereof protected in the enjoyment of their religious and political rights. We had to have the Floridas, because we did not want Spain with a foothold south of us and England with a foothold north of us. We had to acquire Texas—that was a part of the Louisiana purchase, too—because if we did not have it a foreign nation would come up to Missouri, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Kansas. In all these cases we were seeking a natural frontier and we got it. But over yonder there is a people alien to us; 10,000 miles away from us. There are sixty of them to the square mile, and there are only twelve of us to the square mile here. There is no room for our people there, even if they could stand the climate.

I am proud of being a native of Kentucky; prouder of being a Missourian by adoption; proudest of all of being an American. I have made this speech because I wanted to contribute my mite to the preservation of representative government.

When I look into the faces of my little children my heart swells with ineffable pride to think that they are citizens of this mighty Republic, one and indivisible, built not for a day but for all time, bottomed on eternal truth and right and justice, and if we are true to our principles and faithful to our mission, destined under God to be the dominating influence through all the centuries yet to be.

And now may the God of our fathers, the God who inspired the tongue and heart of Patrick Henry, the God who guided the hand of Jefferson while he traced the greatest state paper in the tide of time, the God who sustained Washington and his starving men during seven years of awful war and gave them complete victory on the blood-stained heights of Yorktown, may He preserve this great Republic, the last hope of constitutional government on the face of the earth, from all its enemies, foreign and domestic, and from its unwise friends who would lure it into the path that certainly leadeth to destruction. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY].

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, I am sure we have all been entertained if not instructed by our eloquent friend from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]. I have received in my mail to-day the utterance of another gentleman from Missouri that I am going to read, to show that there is not a unanimity of sentiment even in Missouri. It says:

MY DEAR MR. SIBLEY—

I was going to leave out a little of it, but I will read it all—

Your patriotic speech of yesterday pleased me beyond expression. Within the last month there has been a decided change of sentiment amongst our people, and they are becoming much more Democratic as to sustaining the Government. Our Populistic brethren have worked the cry of anti-expansion for all it was worth, but Democratic instinct refused to accept it as part of our political faith.

Our friends must get back into line or be left, for as sure as we live our party in Missouri is in favor of holding the Philippine Islands as United States territory and of ultimately making a State in the Union of Cuba. We can conceive of no greater measure of liberty or a situation of more independence than being a State in the Union. We look forward with pleasure to the time when our Union of States will be increased by additions of Commonwealths created from the territories we have taken from Spain in our last glorious war.

That is from a Democrat.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri and others on the Democratic side. Name him!

Mr. SIBLEY. That is a personal letter. I have written the gentleman for his permission to give his name; but he is a man who sat on the floor of this House for many years and raised his voice for the principles of Democracy. He was a Chicago platform Democrat [applause on the Republican side], and I had the honor to sit with him in this body.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri and Mr. DINSMORE rose.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask my friend for one moment's interruption.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIBLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I will ask you if that gentleman is not at this time a candidate for an appointment by the McKinley Administration, and if he does not live in Jasper County?

Mr. SIBLEY. I believe this gentleman would not accept any appointment to a Federal position or other position.

Mr. DINSMORE. Will my friend from Pennsylvania yield to me? I desire to ask him if he can explain to me why, if this letter is written by a Democrat, who sat upon this floor as a Democrat, appealing to my friend from Pennsylvania as a Democrat, saying that this party—the Democratic party—must get back to the traditions of Democracy as set forth in the speech which my friend from Pennsylvania made only a day or two ago, the only indorsement and applause it elicited in this House came from the Republican party on the other side of the Chamber. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SIBLEY. Perhaps that is correct. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that I have been invited so many times to take my seat upon the other side of the Chamber that, if standing by the convictions I hold, if standing in defense of all that makes for higher life and better government, if standing patriotically by my country as against her open enemies, it is necessary for a man to sit upon that side of the Chamber, you can constructively place this seat there at this very minute. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Upon the floor of this House you have said to-day that my position in the past was one thing and in two years was another thing, and that two years from now it might be different. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] That I grant you. My hope is that I may ever keep with the living present rather than with the dead past. [Applause on the Republican side.] I would rather be true to the present than consistent with the past. I have been charged with turning my coat. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

I want to tell you that whenever the time comes that the other side of my coat looks better than this side, I will change it quicker than any man you ever saw. [Applause on the Republican side and laughter on the Democratic side.] I want to tell you that there is many a Democrat who can change his coat and cover up the rags and tatters that he is now wearing and present a more respectable appearance to the public view. [Laughter and applause.]

If I were a prodigal, living on the dry husks of the past, and were compelled to eat the fodder with the swine I kept and quarrel with them for a scanty pittance, upon an invitation to a feast and a clean robe I would leave the husks for the sake of the better surroundings elsewhere afforded and leave to my friend from Arkansas, if he will, the diet of husks. That is all I care to say at the present. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DINSMORE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, nobody has just cause to complain about a change of opinion by any servant of the public. It is commendable rather than censurable that one shall follow conscience and judgment wherever it leads. But it does not follow that when one's opinions change he is justified in arrogating to himself such superiority of judgment as to entitle him to say that men who do not see fit to change their opinions quite so frequently as he are necessarily less intelligent or less progressive. I apprehend that nobody on this floor will question the right of any representative of the people to change his mind upon any or even all current public questions. If such a change involves inconsistency, it is a question between him and his constituents, and not to be passed upon by anybody in this Chamber.

As to the fundamental precepts of liberty many of us have not experienced a change of heart. I for one think the Democratic party can afford to base its action in reference to legislation affecting every creature within our jurisdiction on the Declaration of Independence. It can afford to base its action on the Constitution of the United States. It can afford to base its action on the rulings of the Supreme Court and the writings and speeches of the great men who have attempted to define what Congress may and may not do in applying our system to acquired territory. I believe that careful study of these precedents and opinions is a safer guide than can be found in beautiful phrases, high-sounding platitudes, and well-rounded periods. Such speeches charm the imagination, but, unfortunately, are not always instructive. It is unquestionably true that in the past the Democratic party has been the champion of expansion in this country, but it has expanded republican institutions as well as territory. Democratic expansion means enlargement of the domain blessed by constitutional government and liberty as well as of the boundaries of the United States. We would take under our flag no people inimical to its institutions. We would not impose the Government of the United States upon any country by force.

I believe that the Declaration of Independence means something. I believe that all men are created equal and endowed with certain inalienable rights. I believe that governments do derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. Is that heresy? I believe that a government imposed by violence and force is tyranny. Is that heresy or is it Democracy? It is true that the great party of which I am an humble member and whose principles I devoutly believe has added to this nation a vast area of territory, but it is American territory and has been carved into American States. It is to-day peopled by Americans, whose great achievements have increased our material prosperity without in the least disparaging or injuring the politics, institutions, or morals of the country.

If we are to annex the Philippine Islands, it must be with the understanding that the Constitution applies to every part of the territory of the United States. The Constitution says that taxation shall be equal throughout the United States, and the Supreme Court has said that the United States comprises not only the States of the Union, but all territory belonging to the United States. The programme of the imperialist requires avoidance of this provision. We are to have tariff laws levying taxes in our new possessions which are unknown in the States, and in order to carry out this programme a new theory is promulgated as to the meaning of the Constitution. Gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber must be aware that a construction has been placed upon the organic law fatal to their programme, and yet they would attempt to haggle and split hairs about what the words "United States" mean, doubtless hoping that the Supreme Court may be induced to reverse its former decision.

Mr. Chairman, you can not find in the literature of the Republic prior to last year a single syllable that even suggests a limitation of the benign provisions of the Constitution to citizens dwelling in the States comprising the Union. Now, we here proposed the adoption of the theory of liberty preached and practiced by the Romans. They said liberty was for the Romans and slavery for the remainder of mankind. Jefferson taught that liberty was for mankind. Hitherto the Democratic party has professed this faith, and I trust it may ever adhere to it. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERMAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House bill 7941, making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and had come to no resolution thereon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reports that that committee has had under consideration House bill 7941, and has come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have permission not to so much extend my remarks in the RECORD as to straighten them up, rearrange, and fix them to suit myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that he may extend or rearrange his remarks made to-day in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I am not disposed to object to this request; but I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that this has been repeated time after time, so that there are already three or four consents for matters of this kind.

Mr. STEELE. I object.

Mr. DINSMORE. Well, Mr. Speaker, I will make the request for one day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that members of the House may be permitted to print in the RECORD for one day. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

STATE CAPITOL, Sacramento, Cal., February 5, 1900.

Hon. GEORGE C. PERKINS,
United States Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

In accordance with the instructions sent forth in the accompanying joint resolution, I herewith transmit same and certify to its correctness:

Senate joint resolution No. 5, introduced by Senator Jones February 3, 1900.

Read and adopted February 5, 1900. Senate joint resolution No. 5, relative to a so-called reciprocity treaty between this country and the British West India Islands, known as the Jamaica treaty.

Whereas there is now pending in the Senate of the United States, for ratification, a so-called reciprocity treaty between this country and the British West India Islands, known as the Jamaica treaty; and

Whereas the proposed reduction of duties upon the importations from these islands that come into competition with the products of the United States apply only to sugar-cane products, citrus fruits, and fresh vegetables, which are only produced in competing quantities by the States of Florida, Louisiana, and California; and

Whereas the articles of export enumerated in said proposed treaty upon which a reduction of duty is obtained are neither produced nor exported from cities of the said States of Florida, Louisiana, or California, thereby entailing great loss to them without any corresponding benefits; and

Whereas the citrus products of this State, amounting to over 5,000,000 boxes, which will be doubled within the next decade, is handicapped by a freight rate to the principal centers of population and trade of 90 cents per box, which exceeds by 15 cents per box the combined freight rate and the proposed import duty from the British West Indies; and

Whereas the citrus products of these islands come directly into competition with the holiday trade, which is known to be the best of the entire year; and

Whereas the entire imports of the island of Jamaica have never exceeded $8,000,000 dollars per annum, a large proportion of which is imported from England owing to a preferential tariff rate; and

Whereas, at the request of this body and the petition of the citrus fruit-growers of this State, the Fifty-fifth Congress fixed a tariff duty upon that product, placing it on an equality with the foreign production in respect to the freight rate only; and

Whereas the American producer is entitled to and ought by right to enjoy the benefit of his home market when fully able to supply the demand: Therefore,

Resolved by the senate of the State of California, the assembly jointly, That it deprecates the attempt to disturb the present existing conditions of the tariff upon sugar, citrus fruits, and fresh vegetables; that it is an unequal and unjust hardship to sacrifice the interests of a few for the benefit of a very large majority; that the supposed benefits accruing to this country in its added proportion of the $8,000,000 of trade with Jamaica will not compensate it for the loss inflicted upon one item alone of California production; that the California producer is entitled to a protective duty as against foreign competition at least equal to the difference in their several freight rates, and that the American producer should be maintained in his demand for the market of his own country; and be it

Further resolved, That our Senators be instructed to vote against the ratification of said treaty, and that our Representatives in Congress be requested to use their influence and best efforts to accomplish its defeat.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be telegraphed to the Hon. GEORGE C. PERKINS by the secretary of senate, and that a copy be transmitted by mail to each of our Representatives in Washington.

F. J. BRANDON,
Secretary of Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask to have printed an amendment which I intended to offer to House bill No. 1, and which I ask may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Amend H. R. No. 1 by striking out lines 13 to 22, inclusive, on page 10, and inserting the following:

"That the dollar at the standard weight of 25.8 grains of gold nine-tenths fine or 412½ grains of silver shall be the unit of value, and all forms of money issued or coined by the United States shall be maintained at a parity of value with this standard; and United States notes and Treasury notes issued under the act of July 14, 1890, when presented to the Treasury for redemption, shall be redeemed in gold or silver coin of such standard."

Add as a new section the following:

Such notes shall be full legal tender. Any citizen of the United States shall have the right to deposit United States bonds, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and receive from such fund 90 per cent of the face value of such bonds in United States Treasury notes, and shall have the right at any time within twelve months to redeem such bonds by repaying in United States Treasury notes the amount so received by him on account of such bonds, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum on such amount. Failure to so redeem such bonds within the limit of twelve months shall operate as a forfeiture of such bonds to the United States, and such bonds shall be sold to the highest bidder in the open market, and the balance, after the payment of the principal of the amount advanced, the interest on the same, and the expenses, shall be paid to the former owner of such bonds. Any moneys received from such sale may be exchanged with other moneys in the Treasury, so that this fund shall consist alone of Treasury notes. The principal of all sums so advanced when repaid shall be returned to the "emergency circulation fund," and all interest upon such sums shall be passed to the credit of the Treasury under miscellaneous receipts.

"The actual amount of notes held in the 'emergency circulation fund' shall never be less than $50,000,000 in excess of any outstanding advances. Said fund shall neither be increased nor diminished except in the manner provided."

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. GALLINGER. In accordance with the notice given yesterday, I present a proposed amendment to paragraph 5 of Rule XIV, which I ask shall be read, printed, and referred to the Committee on Rules.

The Secretary read as follows:

Amend paragraph 5 of Rule XIV so that it shall read as follows:

"All resolutions shall be referred without debate to their appropriate committees, unless the Senate by unanimous consent shall otherwise order."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be referred to the Committee on Rules, and printed.

ADDITIONAL CLERICAL ASSISTANCE.

Mr. CHANDLER submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be authorized to employ additional clerical assistance in connection with the investigations which said committee is authorized to make, at a cost not exceeding $600, the same to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate on vouchers approved by the chairman of said committee.

STATUE OF LAFAYETTE AT PARIS EXPOSITION.

Mr. DEPEW. I desire to call up the joint resolution (S. R. 55) authorizing the President to appoint one woman commissioner to represent the United States and the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution at the unveiling of the statue of Lafayette at the exposition in Paris, France, in 1900. The joint resolution upon a former day was considered by the Senate and went over in order to make inquiry on a question which was raised here as to whether the French Government would permit women representatives at the exposition. It has been ascertained that they will, and that they are to be appointed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Two amendments to the joint resolution were agreed to as in Committee of the Whole. If there be no further amendments it will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read as amended; as the amendments have been agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read as amended.

The Secretary read the joint resolution as amended, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President may appoint one woman commissioner to represent the United States and the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution at the unveiling of the statue of Lafayette and the presentation of a tablet for said statue at Paris, France, in 1900, and at the exposition then to be held.

That said commissioner shall not be entitled to receive compensation for any services rendered in connection with this mission.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to strike out the last clause of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri move to strike out the words which were placed in as an amendment, "and at the exposition then to be held?"

Mr. COCKRELL. No; what I want is to so amend it that this representative will receive the same compensation that others receive, and to place her on an equality with the others.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. Strike out the words:

That said commissioner shall not be entitled to receive compensation for any services rendered in connection with this mission.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate agree to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri?

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. When the question of the money necessary to carry on this exhibit was before the Committee on Appropriations the question was raised about a woman's exhibit. We examined and ascertained that there was no exhibit which would be in charge of women alone, and in consequence of that no provision was made specifically for that kind of an exhibit.

Now I understand the President intends to appoint a lady as one of the commissioners, and I doubt not the French Government will not object to that. That being the intention of the President, I see no impropriety in passing the joint resolution as it is. I understand that the President will appoint one or more ladies on the commission, and this joint resolution is to designate one lady for a specific purpose.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 6493) for the relief of John Anderson, a Pottawatomie Indian, and his adult children, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

TRANSACTIONS BETWEEN TREASURY DEPARTMENT AND BANKS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A resolution by Mr. ALLEN, providing for a special committee to make a thorough and complete investigation of all dealings and transactions between the Secretary of the Treasury or the Treasury Department and the National City Bank and the Hanover National Bank of New York, etc.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move to refer the resolution to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask the Senator to let that motion go over until to-morrow. I wish to make some reply to the speech of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], and I do not wish to interpose it before the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY] shall have finished his speech. He is ready to go on. Is that course agreeable to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island can enter his motion and have it lie over.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is my purpose, to have it lie over, without losing its place, until to-morrow morning.

Mr. ALLEN. That is entirely agreeable to me, provided I can have an opportunity to reply to the Senator from Wisconsin if I deem it advisable.

Mr. SPOONER. I have no doubt the Senator will deem it advisable and I know he will have an opportunity.

Mr. ALLEN. I have no doubt the Senator will say many things that will be worthy of my consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there unanimous consent that the motion may be entered and that the resolution shall lie over, retaining its place? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

SOUTH AFRICAN REPUBLIC.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a former day, and which is before the Senate by unanimous consent. It will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. PETTIGREW on the 2d instant, as follows:

Whereas from the hour of achieving their own independence the people of the United States have regarded with sympathy the struggles of other people to free themselves from European domination: Therefore,

Resolved, That we watch with deep and abiding interest the heroic battle of the South African Republic against cruelty and oppression, and our best hopes go out for the full success of their determined contest for liberty.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask that the resolution be laid over, as there is no opportunity, I see, to speak to it this morning, on account of other notices. I ask that it may go over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that this resolution may lie over, retaining its place. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I desire to call up for a few moments the financial bill, to make a few suggestions to my friend from Rhode Island with regard to his new movement, or that of the Committee on Finance. The amendment of which he gave notice this morning to the financial bill reads as follows:

That the provisions of this act are not intended to place any obstacles in the way of the accomplishment of international bimetallism, provided the same be secured by concurrent action of the leading commercial nations of the world and at a ratio which shall insure permanence of relative value between gold and silver.

I suppose any ratio will do that. Whatever ratio the nations of the world fix, that would be the relation. The legal relation is always the commercial ratio between gold and silver.

But what I wish more particularly to call attention to is the declaration in the amendment that there is no intention to interfere with international bimetallism by this bill. The bill makes all the obligations of the Government payable in gold. Would not that be something of an obstacle? If you are going to treat with other nations, our obligations are now payable in either gold or silver. We have been in a position where our obligations were payable in either gold or silver, but when you tie our hands then we can not treat, for you make our obligations payable in gold. You adopt the gold standard in so many words, and then you say you have no intention of interfering with bimetallism.

It reminds me of a story I once heard. Whether it is true or false is immaterial; it illustrates the point. There was an old Quaker on board the Constitution. They wanted to make him fight, but he would not fight. But when the British came to climb up the sides of the vessel he took a marline spike and struck them on the fingers and knocked them down into the water, and he said, "Oh, I don't mean to hurt thee; I trust thee can swim!" And he kept pounding away.

Now, they do not wish to hurt bimetallism, but they by legislation place it beyond the possibility of ever being reached if this bill becomes a law. To offer such an amendment to such a bill when they say they do not intend to do what they are doing, it seems to me, is trifling with the subject. I am willing to treat the whole subject seriously, but to put such an amendment on the bill is presuming too largely on our ignorance.

The Senator from Rhode Island must know that the amendment is trifling with the question. He ought for his own credit to withdraw it.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is concluded.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President——

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I should like to call up a bill on the Calendar.

Mr. CAFFERY. I had the floor yesterday evening and am ready to proceed for the purpose of concluding my remarks.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill similar to one that has heretofore passed the Senate several times. It will give rise to no debate. I am very anxious to get it through.

Mr. CAFFERY. I should like to know if I have the floor?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that under what took place when the Senator left the floor yesterday he ought to be entitled to it. So he recognizes the Senator from Louisiana. Will the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. CAFFERY. For how long, may I inquire of the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I do not desire to interfere with the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. CAFFERY. My remarks will be brief this morning.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I simply desire to call up a bill that has heretofore passed the Senate two or three times. I am sure it will not lead to any debate; but I do not desire to interfere with the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. CAFFERY. If it will not lead to any debate, I am willing to yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana yields to the Senator from North Dakota for the purpose of calling up a bill.

BRIDGE AT DRAYTON, N. DAK.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 160) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Red River of the North at Drayton, N. Dak.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, page 1, line 3, to strike out "trustees" and insert "council;" in the same line to strike out "town" and insert "city;" in line 8, after "Almeron," to insert "or Grant;" and after those words to strike out "street" and insert "streets;" so as to read:

That the council of the city of Drayton, county of Pembina, State of North Dakota, be, and are hereby, authorized to construct and maintain a pontoon bridge and approaches thereto across the Red River of the North, between the State of North Dakota and the State of Minnesota, extending from the foot of Almeron or Grant streets in said town of Drayton to a point opposite, in the State of Minnesota.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, page 2, line 2, to strike out "trustees" and insert "council;" so as to read:

Said bridge shall be constructed so as to provide for the passage of wagons and vehicles of all kinds, animals, and foot passengers, and for all road travel, for such reasonable rates of toll and under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by said council and approved from time to time by the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, page 2, line 25, to strike out the word "trustees" and insert "council;" on page 3, line 1, to strike out "town" and insert "city;" and in line 2 to strike out "town" and insert "city;" so as to read:

Provided, That said draw shall be opened promptly, upon reasonable signal, for the passage of boats and rafts; and said council of the city of Drayton shall maintain, at the expense of the said city, from sunset to sunrise, such lights or other signals on said bridge as the Light-House Board shall prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, page 3, line 12, to strike out "town" and insert "city;" so as to read "said city of Drayton."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, page 4, line 2, to strike out "town" and insert "city;" and in the same line to strike out "trustees" and insert "council."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, page 4, line 20, after the word "reserved," to strike out the remainder of the section, in the following words:

And the right to require any changes in the said structure or its entire removal at the expense of the owners thereof, whenever the Secretary of War shall decide that the public interests so require, is also expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SELMA, ALA.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. CAFFERY. I do, if there is no objection to the bill, and if it is a short one.

Mr. PETTUS. By the courtesy of the Senator from Louisiana I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1174) for the erection of a public building at Selma, Ala.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase or otherwise provide a site and cause to be erected thereon a substantial and commodious building, with fireproof vaults, for the use and accommodation of the post-office, and for other Government uses, at Selma, Ala. The building thereon, when completed upon plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed in cost $100,000, including cost of site.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POLICY REGARDING THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, when I concluded my remarks yesterday afternoon I had reached a point where I proposed to discuss the facts bearing upon our relations with the Philippine Islands, but I will now leave that branch of the subject and take up certain opinions of eminent men bearing on the subject which I have discussed and lay them before the Senate.

Yesterday I was unable to find the quotation from Mr. Webster which I propose to lay before the Senate. I have now obtained it, and will read it. It is an extract from a speech of Mr. Webster on the "Objects of the Mexican war," found in his works, volume 5, page 300. That extract is as follows:

Arbitrary governments may have territories and distant possessions, because arbitrary governments may rule them by different laws and different systems. Russia may rule in the Ukraine and the provinces of the Caucasus and Kamtschatka by different codes, ordinances, or ukases. We can do no such thing. They must be of us, part of us, or else strangers.

If the great name of Mr. Webster can in argument as counsel in a case before the Supreme Court be quoted in opposition to these views, I submit that when that great statesman, feeling the full weight of responsibility upon him for his utterances upon such a question, addressed the Senate of the United States, more weight ought to attach to those utterances than to those of an advocate in the discharge of his duty to his client. The position of Mr. Webster is that arbitrary governments have no place in our system; that we can not rule by different systems than our own these distant possessions. Russia may rule the Ukraine and the provinces of the Caucasus, but, according to Mr. Webster, we can only rule according to our own system and our own laws.

Our Constitution is not so elastic as even that of England, where unlimited power resides in the British Parliament. The British Parliament can rule India under arbitrary sway, or rule any of its colonies under arbitrary sway; but, Mr. President, it is to be observed that in the rule of England, justified under her system, that arbitrary sway never extends to people who have the force and the ability to resent it. She is trying it now in the Transvaal, and she is trying it at her bitter cost.

I now quote an extract from the speech of Mr. Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, on the subject of the ratification of the treaty between Russia and the United States in the acquisition of Alaska. This extract is very instructive. I read from his speech, thus:

But there is one other point on which I file my caveat. This treaty must not be a precedent for a system of indiscriminate and costly annexation. Sincerely believing that republican institutions under the primacy of the United States must embrace this whole continent, I can not adopt the sentiment of Jefferson, who, while confessing satisfaction in settlements on the Pacific coast, saw there in the future nothing but "free and independent Americans," bound to the United States only by "ties of blood and interest," without political unity. Nor am I willing to restrain myself to the principle so tersely expressed by Andrew Jackson in his letter to President Monroe: "Concentrate our population, confine our frontier to proper limits, until our country to those limits is filled with a dense population." But I can not disguise my anxiety that every stage in our predestined future shall be by natural processes without war, and, I would add, even without purchase. There is no territorial aggrandizement which is worth the price of blood.

That, sir, is a stinging commentary upon the forcible annexation of the Philippines. This great man announces the doctrine that no territory is worth the price of blood, and the blood of our soldiers and the blood of the Filipinos will forever ensanguine the annexation of those islands, and vast seas will not wash out the bloody spots.

Only under peculiar circumstances can it become the subject of peculiar contract. Our triumph should be by growth and organic expansion in obedience to "preestablished harmony," recognizing always the will of those who are to become our fellow-citizens. All this must be easy if we are only true to ourselves. Our motto may be that of Goethe, "Without haste, without rest." Let the Republic be assured in tranquil liberty with all equal before the law, and it will conquer by its sublime example.

Is there any equality under the law contemplated in the resolutions before the Senate or in the treaty of Paris itself? The political status and the civil rights of the Filipinos are reserved for the determination of Congress. Now, sir, if they did not contemplate an inequality of political status and civil rights, why insert that reservation in the treaty? Why turn over to Congress the settling of the political status of those people? What do they mean by "political status?" Do they mean that those people are not ipso facto citizens of the United States by the very acquisition of the territory? If so, they stultify themselves. Citizenship is an international fact as well as a national fact. The nations of the world will consider those people citizens of the United States; and the United States Constitution embraces them within its folds, and this notwithstanding their coming in is involuntary.

More happy than Austria, who acquired possessions by marriage, we shall acquire them by the attraction of republican institutions:

"Bella gerant alii; tu, felix Austria, nube; Nam quæ Mars aliis, dat tibi regna Venus."

The famous epigram will be just as applicable to us, inasmuch as our acquisitions will be under the sanction of wedlock to the Republic. There may be wedlock of a people as well as of a prince. Meanwhile our first care should be to improve and elevate the Republic whose sway will be so comprehensive. Plant it with schools, cover it with churches, fill it with libraries, make it abundant with comfort, so that poverty shall disappear; keep it constant in the assertion of human rights. And here we may fitly recall those words of antiquity, which Cicero quoted from the Greek, and which Webster in our day quoted from Cicero, "You have a Sparta; adorn it."

We have an America. Let us adorn it. Let us not encircle the brow of Columbia with a bloody wreath. Let rather a garland of sweet roses, as an emblem of peace, encircle her noble brow. This quotation breathes the very spirit of the Declaration of Independence and the elevating principles of the Constitution of the United States. We should take no country without the will and consent of the people in it. We should acquire no territory by blood. We must adorn and elevate our Republic by our sublime example and by the dissemination of our institutions abroad. Let the territories that come to us come to us in loving wedlock. Let them be married to our institutions, and let them be of our household, willing and obedient members of our household, who will help us in our endeavors toward a higher and higher ideal of liberty and development.

Is that the case with the Philippine Islands, Mr. President? Here we have been warring for more than a year—terrible war, terrible devastation, blood and ruin and havoc everywhere—in defiance of the principles announced by this distinguished and illustrious man.

Mr. President, I am glad, and I rejoice, that Massachusetts has here upon this floor a worthy successor of Webster and of Sumner. I am glad that he announces the principles of the Declaration of Independence and the principles of our Constitution as applicable to those people. I am glad that he stands foremost in our ranks as the champion of human liberty and the guardian of constitutional right and constitutional law.

I shall but briefly touch the facts bearing upon our relations with the Philippines, both past and present. These facts have been run over to such an extent and with so much care by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] that it would be a useless work for me to undertake to supplement his labors.

It appears that in 1896 a revolution started in the Philippine Islands under the leadership of Aguinaldo. That revolution had proceeded to such an extent that the Spaniards were driven to their fortified towns on the seacoast, and the insurgents held the balance of the territory. When the position became analogous to that of Cuba, when the insurgents could not drive the Spaniards from their fortified towns, nor the Spaniards defeat the insurgents in the country, a compromise was entered into. The Spanish Government made a compromise whereby the deportation of the leaders of the insurrection was agreed on, and Aguinaldo and certain of his followers were paid $800,000 for leaving the country, so that things could settle down. They left. But a part of the agreement was that the Spanish Government would grant certain reforms to the Filipinos; that they would give them representation in the Cortes; that they would provide for them an autonomous government to a large extent; that they would reform the abuses that had crept into the church and grant other reforms which I do not now recall.

Aguinaldo retired to Hongkong. Four hundred thousand dollars of money was left in a bank in Hongkong as security that the Spaniards would comply with their promise. They did not comply. That money was used by Aguinaldo subsequently, and intended to be used by him all the time, for the purpose of raising another insurrection and for the purpose of again commencing hostilities against the Spaniards. While he was in Hongkong Admiral Dewey sunk the Spanish fleet. Hearing of this, Aguinaldo hastened to Singapore, and there he had a conference with Consul Pratt, and from that point—I will not now go into the conversations between him and Consul Pratt, for it is not necessary—from that point Consul Pratt sent a telegram to Admiral Dewey, informing him that Aguinaldo was present at Singapore and desired to go over to Manila to help the American forces. A telegram was received from Admiral Dewey to the effect, substantially, of inviting Aguinaldo to come. He came with thirteen of his staff. Immediately after landing he commenced to organize the insurrection in cooperation with our military commanders. His cooperation was invited by General Anderson, and accepted. He was armed by Admiral Dewey; his assistance was accepted; he surrounded Manila; he cooped up the Spaniards within the walls of that city; he got up an army, according to the official statements of our consul, of about 30,000 men. With those 30,000 men he drove the Spaniards out of any control whatever of the interior. Those are the facts up to that point.

It is asserted by Admiral Dewey that he never mentioned independence to Aguinaldo; that he never employed him as an ally or engaged him as an ally. It was known that Aguinaldo, from repeated expressions of his, was fighting for the independence of the Filipino people; and whether Admiral Dewey accepted him in terms as an ally or not, he did so in fact, and the whole American Army accepted him in fact as an ally. Why quibble about words when facts speak stronger than words? Why go into an unseemly discussion in this body as to whether or not Aguinaldo is a liar? There are facts that can not be controverted that make him an ally; and why go into any investigation of the point whether Admiral Dewey in terms accepted him as one? He was an ally; he rendered us important services; he drove the Spaniards from the country and cooped them up in the fortified towns; and the testimony of two most intelligent explorers sent out by Admiral Dewey himself, Ensign Sargent and Lieutenant Wilcox, is to the effect that Aguinaldo had established a complete de facto government, with full control of Luzon; that quiet and order obtained everywhere where he had jurisdiction; that he administered the ordinary affairs of government, and that the Filipinos gladly welcomed his leadership and gladly enrolled under his banner.

Mr. President, that creates a state of facts which rendered the Filipino government such that it could have been recognized as an independent republic. They had control of that whole island, except the city of Manila, and with all its territory, with armies organized, with a government organized, with administration of the law, with all the civil departments of government in full and active operation. Then Aguinaldo's government, or the government of the Filipino people, was a de facto government. It had every muniment of a government; it possessed title to recognition more than the Cubans did, whom we recognized as belligerents by a resolution of this body. The Cubans did not have so good a title as the Filipinos had after the cooperation of Aguinaldo was accepted and after Aguinaldo had established this government. Let Aguinaldo be what he may, let him be what his enemies depict him, let him be everything that his friends say of him, it has not anything to do with the fact that the government established there was in full possession of the territory of Luzon, except the fortified town of Manila, and the Filipinos themselves rendered willing obedience to the sway of that government, whatever it was. It does not make any difference whether that government was a military despotism or whether it was a free republic, it was that sort of a government that the Filipinos at that period wanted; it was that sort of a government which they accepted; it was that sort of a government to which they gave their consent.

Then what occurred? After inviting his cooperation, through General Anderson, who was the first military commander in charge, our authorities became chary of any recognition of Aguinaldo. A change had come over the spirit of the dream of our rulers. From wanting a coaling station only in Luzon, our covetous eye seemed to take in the whole of the Philippine group, the island of Luzon, the Visayas, and the Sulu group. The gaudy bauble of empire was held up as a coveted prize, and we grasped at it. From the moment that this insidious and pernicious idea seized possession of the American mind in high places, from that very moment we commenced treating Aguinaldo as an insurgent. When he demanded a parley and a cessation of hostilities, he was told that the war having commenced, it must go on to the grim end. Every step in the progress since that time has been military domination; every step has been marked by blood; every inch of the territory of the island of Luzon has been traveled over by armed men, until the American forces have virtually destroyed the insurgent army and scattered it into roving bands.

It is said now that we must change the term from that of "insurgents" to that of "banditti." Why give them the name of insurgents, Mr. President? Why go out of our way to say that they are rebelling against the authority of the United States if they are not citizens of the United States? How is it that we can hold these people as insurrectionaries against our authority when they are hanging in mid-air, neither Filipinos nor Americans? I propounded the question yesterday whether or not these people, if not citizens of the United States, were anything. That question has been revolving in my head for some time. I can not tell for the life of me what the imperialists hold the Filipinos to be. If they are insurrectionists, then they are in insurrection against the authority of the Constitution of the United States; then they are citizens of the United States; then they are under the jurisdiction of the United States, and they have all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States.

I will, without reading—for I do not desire to take up the time of the Senate to any great extent, and I have occupied too much of it already—introduce various extracts from Senate Executive Document No. 62, showing the various facts which I have briefly narrated, and some letters from the Outlook. They are the correspondence between our consuls and the State Department and the letters of Messrs. Sargent and Wilcox. I take these letters to be authentic and true. They were introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] as an appendix to his remarks, and I feel warranted in introducing them as proof of the assertions I have made.

Mr. HOAR. They were indorsed by Admiral Dewey.

Mr. CAFFERY. Yes, sir; they were sent out by Admiral Dewey himself, and their statements were indorsed by Admiral Dewey as being full and satisfactory, giving a more complete description of the islands, their inhabitants, and their condition, both military and civil, than was contained in any other report up to that time.

The papers referred to are as follows:

CONSULAR REPORTS ON PHILIPPINE AFFAIRS.

Mr. Williams to Mr. Cridler.

No. 9.] CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Manila, Philippine Islands, February 22, 1898.

SIR: Without specific instructions it seems my duty at this critical period to inform the Washington Government somewhat as to political conditions here. But as I have been here less than a month vigilance has not overcome all difficulties, and the rigid censorship of the press in general and the suppression of such publications as uttered the truth have made news gathering onerous.

I have before me a lengthy dispatch giving dates of many warlike and political matters, with rumors, observations, and conclusions, but deem it wise to write more briefly to-day, to bide events and wait specific instructions from you.

Peace was proclaimed, and since my coming festivities therefor were held; but there is no peace, and has been none for about two years. Conditions here and in Cuba are practically alike. War exists, battles are of almost daily occurrence, ambulances bring in many wounded, and hospitals are full. Prisoners are brought here and shot without trial, and Manila is under martial law.

The Crown forces have not been able to dislodge a rebel army within 10 miles of Manila, and last Saturday, February 19, a battle was there fought and 5 dead left on the field. Much of such information is found in my longer dispatch, referred to, and which is at your command.

The Governor-General, who is amiable and popular, having resigned, wishes credit for pacification, and certain rebel leaders were given a cash bribe of $1,650,000 to consent to public deportation to China. This bribe and deportation only multiplied claimants and fanned the fires of discontent.

Insurgents demand fewer exactions from church and state, a half of public offices, and fewer church holidays, which seriously retard business.

A republic is organized here, as in Cuba. Insurgents are being armed and drilled; are rapidly increasing in numbers and efficiency, and all agree that a general uprising will come as soon as the Governor-General embarks for Spain, which is fixed for March.

While some combatant regiments have recently been returned to Spain, it was for appearance only, and all authorities now agree that unless the Crown largely reenforces its army here it will lose possession.

Command me for any desired information.

Your obedient servant,

OSCAR F. WILLIAMS, Consul.

Mr. Williams to Mr. Cridler.

No. 2, special.] CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Manila, Philippine Islands, March 19, 1898.

SIR: Matters are in a serious state here. I have daily communication by cable and letter with Commodore Dewey, but we pass letters by British and other shipmasters and by private parties, because cables and letters are tampered with.

Insurrection is rampant; many killed, wounded, and made prisoners on both sides. A battle ship, the Don Juan de Austria, sent this week to the northern part of Luzon to cooperate with a land force of 2,000 dispatched to succor local forces, overwhelmed by rebels.

Last night special squads of mounted police were scattered at danger points to save Manila.

I caution Americans against bearing arms in violation of local law, although threats have been made by Spaniards that all Americans would soon have their throats cut. Certain ones are so frightened as to frequently come to my consulate and hotel, and spies watch all my movements.

Yesterday I examined stock of an American who had been threatened and abstracted his ledger. To-day his inventory and accounts were placed in my safe. To-day two others came to me to send their effects to some American ship lying in the bay, and I have so planned.

I have no instructions from you as to these delicate complications, but so far have gotten on well. I fly our flag all the time, give double hours to the consulate, and have notified Americans that they can find me all the time at the consulate, or at my hotel, or on the path between. We have many holidays, but I keep open consulate every day, including Sundays, so Americans may find me.

Rebellion never more threatening to Spain. Rebels getting arms, money, and friends, and they outnumber the Spaniards, resident and soldiery, probably a hundred to one.

Report says that Holy Week the insurgents plan to burn and capture Manila. But, if so, you will learn it by wire before you receive this dispatch.

My March quarterly reports may be delayed or captured. If no trouble thwarts my work, all reports from here will be sent by first mail after March 31, but my consular agents at Cebu and Iloilo are both absent, and hence I may not receive their reports for transmission as early as I send my own.

All news comes direct from Washington. I hear nothing as to relations between United States and Spain, and, depending upon unofficial reports, I must act as if peace reigned. I can only assure you of vigilance and loyalty, await your instructions, and remain,

Your most obedient servant,

OSCAR F. WILLIAMS, Consul.

Mr. Williams to Mr. Cridler.

Special.] CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Manila, Philippine Islands, March 27, 1898.

SIR: Because of having given daily information to Commodore Dewey as to disturbances here I have assumed that he informed the Washington Government, and I have written little on war matters.

Cuban conditions exist here possibly in aggravated form. Spanish soldiers are killed and wounded daily, despite claimed pacification, and the hospitals are kept full.

The majority of casualties are reported from the ranks of the native insurgents, and the cruelties and horrors of war are daily repeated.

Cavite is the naval port of Luzon, situated about 8 miles across the bay from Manila and about 20 miles distant by way of bay shore and public highway, and last Thursday, March 24, a Crown regiment of natives, the Seventy-fourth, stationed there, was ordered to advance against native insurgents near by. The regiment refused to obey orders, and eight corporals were called out and shot to death in presence of the regiment, which was again ordered to advance and threat made that a refusal would be death to all. All did refuse and were sent to barracks to await sentence. On the morning of the following Friday, March 25, the entire regiment, with arms and equipment, marched out of the barracks and deserted in a body to the insurgents, saying they were willing to fight the foreign enemies of Spain, but would not fight their friends.

Since beginning this dispatch I learn of the desertion to the insurgents of another entire regiment. These are said to be the severest setbacks received by Spain during the two years' insurrection here.

On Friday morning, March 25, a church holiday, a meeting of natives was being held near my consulate in Manila, the natives being unarmed. The building was surrounded by police and military, the meeting broken up, 12 natives wantonly shot to death, several wounded, and 62 taken prisoners. Saturday morning, March 26, the 62 prisoners were marched in a body to the cemetery and shot to death, although it was shown that several were chance passers-by or employees in ships adjoining, not being in attendance at the meeting.

It was cold comfort to the widows and orphans of innocent men to have Spanish officers present them the mangled corpses of husbands and fathers.

Such horrors, but usually on a smaller scale, but at times attended by greater disregard for modern rules of war, occur almost daily, and the piteous cry goes up, "Will it ever stop?"

The Crown forces are now building a cordon of small forts on city's outskirts for defense against provincial natives, who are expected to soon attack Manila. In fact, two detectives and one messenger have come to me this evening with information that attack was to be made to-night, and everybody is anxious, as 8,000 native insurgent soldiers are encamped only 5 miles away.

The insurgents seem to lack arms and organization, but, so far as I can learn, outnumber the Spanish forces and inhabitants 20 to 1. Arms are being obtained and organization slowly effected, and all classes fear the near future. It is said that the only reason why Manila has not been taken and burned is because a vast majority of its population is in perfect accord with the insurgents.

Because of anxiety among Americans and my wish to keep in reach of all demands, I keep the consulate open double hours and on all holidays and Sundays, with biggest flag flying, so any needing a refuge may find it.

Barbarities are reported as daily practiced, such as placing prisoners and suspects in black-hole dungeons in the walls of old Manila, so placed that with rise of tide prisoners are drowned; several hundred reported to have so perished.

Cruelties too horrid for an official report are detailed to me every day, and it seems that the cry of outraged humanity would soon compel Spain to abolish Middle Age methods of warfare.

Christian nations are such only in name when such atrocities as daily blacken the calendar are known to be perpetrated here and no effort made to protect the weak.

There is to-day no Christian nation—policy and mock diplomacy govern all: the vilest cruelties of war are added to the mangling of old men, women, and children to make full the measure of iniquity.

The American Indians would not permit one of their tribes to practice such barbarities. Why should so-called Christian nations decline to call a halt upon Spanish outrages?

All information as to defenses of Manila has been sent to Commodore George Dewey at Hongkong.

For fear of confiscation this dispatch and other mail go by messenger to Hongkong, to be there mailed.

Cable is cut in three places. I keep copies of dispatches, etc., but at present, for reasons, they are not copied on the register at consulate.

I remain, etc.,

OSCAR F. WILLIAMS,
United States Consul, Manila.

Mr. Williams to Mr. Day.

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,
Manila, Philippine Islands, March 31, 1898.

HONORED SIR: My returns and accounts for March quarter to both your Department and the Treasury having been perfected and mailed, I turn with reluctance, but from a sense of duty, to somewhat inform you, as Secretary for Foreign Affairs, of the insurrection which for about two years has devastated these marvelously fair islands, "covered them with blood, often of the innocent, and has bereft thousands of homes of the husbands and sons who were the sole breadwinners."

Last week Thursday, March 24, at Cavite, near here, the Seventy-fourth Spanish Regiment, recruited among the natives of the southern islands of this group, refused to obey orders and attack the native insurrectionists. Eight corporals were called out and shot to death in presence of the regiment. Again orders to advance were given and disobeyed, when death to all was threatened. The regiment expressed a willingness to fight the foreign enemies of Spain, but said they would all be shot rather than fight their friends. All were sent to barracks to be punished later, but the next morning all took arms and deserted to the insurgents.

On Friday, March 25, a church and legal holiday, unarmed natives were holding a meeting near my consulate. The building was surrounded by police and the suspicious military, the meeting broken up, 12 natives shot to death, several wounded, and 62 prisoners taken, certain of whom were mere passers-by, not having attended the meeting. The next morning these 62 prisoners, without form of trial, were marched in a body to the cemetery and all shot to death.

Hardly a day passes without such scenes of Middle Age treachery and barbarity. A recent uprising at Cape Bolinao, on the northwest coast of this island (Luzon), about 300 miles from Manila, was crushed by united action of two regiments of infantry aided by the battle ship Don Juan de Austria. A British shipmaster there at the time reports about 40 killed and 40 wounded. After surrender, the Spaniards put dead and wounded together in a house, and by burning it cremated all.

In the old walls of "Walled Manila," built about three hundred years ago, are said to be several "black-hole" dungeon prisons, in which incarceration is almost sure death. Two of these, both of which I have seen, with apertures at summit of wall, have floors below low tide, so 2 or 3 feet of slime, mud, and water floor the dungeons. In these hundreds of so-called insurgents have lately been placed, and all drowned by the rising tide. No judge, no jury—simply hate, suspicion, treachery. Of this several reports have been made to me, one that above 200 victims were counted in one of these prisons. No reliance can be placed upon the public press. Censorship is rigid, and the oldest daily there, El Diario de Manila, and another have been suspended by public order because truth was told.

Months ago pacification was claimed by the Governor-General. It was false. A truce had been bought with $1,650,000, during which the Governor-General hoped to embark for Spain, but all was a hollow farce.

The Madrid Government seems now to understand all, and the Governor-General has been ordered to remain, and his appointed successor sent to one of the provinces.

Now 5,000 armed rebels, which for days have been encamped near Manila and have been reenforced from the mountains, plan to attack the city to-night. All is excitement and life uncertain.

News came this afternoon of the wounding of a governor of one of the southern provinces and the defeat of the Crown forces under his command.

The only church permitted here is the Roman Catholic, and its interference with the Government, its intolerance, immorality, and despotism are perhaps the greatest bar to progress in these islands.

From consensus of opinion received from men of several nationalities, from oldest foreign residents, from natives, Chinese, and a few Spaniards, I believe that of the Philippine people, estimated at 15,000,000, not 5 per cent are loyal to Spain.

But officials and priests, the leeches of the people, are in authority, have money, influence, and cunning, so that the natives and half breeds (Chinese and European) are more or less controlled.

During the period when war between the United States and Spain was expected, which seems happily now to be disappearing, I daily heard the assurance that the natives, half-breeds, Chinese merchants, and such Spaniards as were in business were all ready to welcome our fleet, fight with it to hoist over these islands the United States flag, and swear allegiance to it; and once done, all interests here would thrive, be settled and happy.

I have daily felt it a duty to inform you, but for nearly the entire period of my incumbency every odd hour of day and many of evenings have been given to inspection of forts, arsenals, and battle ships in order to fully inform Commodore Dewey at Hongkong.

And because his means of communication with Washington were better than my own, I have trusted all to him. Another fact, I have not had money to cable Commodore Dewey as asked, but needed to borrow for it.

Fortunately, I have been well every hour, so that by double hours at the consulate, and by keeping it open, with flag flying on holidays and Sundays, the Americans have felt sure of a refuge if trouble came, and threats were freely made that all Americans would have their throats cut. I have not dared to fully trust the post-office or telegraph company, as letters and cables have been freely tampered with, and hence have, until to-day, sent much mail by private messengers to Hongkong, and have received mail the same way.

To-day's mail being returns and accounts, etc., and having no chance to send to Hongkong, all was mailed here. This will be sent by messenger to China.

Now bubonic plague exists at Hongkong, and quarantine here delays ships, and Governor-General has ordered that ships take no passengers from these islands.

By discoveries here and by a plan devised, I have saved the United States Treasury in two months nearly double the amount of my salary, and each year hereafter it will be saved $300 from one item alone.

My hotel room has been searched, and, I believe, my consulate also, and friends have daily called to advise me to seek safety in hiding or in flight; but I have not shared their fears sufficiently to leave a post at which you had expectations that I would remain and perform every loyal duty to your Department and to our Government.

All officials have treated me well except one underling, whose head I threatened to smash, and with a return of cordiality between nations I shall make all official calls anew, as I have but just received my exequatur from Madrid.

My work for the commodore now lighter, I shall prepare reports on Philippine tariff, import wants, products, and institutions for the departments at Washington.

I do not copy this on the records of the consulate, because it may be there read any night by spies, and if so, my usefulness as well as my personal comfort would be impaired. I dare not even intrust my cipher cables and code to the old office safe, but carry all in my pockets.

Mr. Williams to Mr. Day.

Special.] CRUISER BALTIMORE,
CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
MANILA BAY, OPPOSITE CAVITE,
Manila, Philippine Islands, May 12, 1898.

SIR: To aid you, if possible, permit me to give assurance of the friendliness of the Philippine natives to our country and to me as its representative.

During the period of my residence in Manila, every week was a history of barbarities by Spaniards, and of efforts, often futile, of the natives to obtain rights and protect their homes.

Scores of times I have heard hopes expressed that either United States or Great Britain would acquire these islands. In all this foreign residents, other than Spanish, concurred; and all such classes are most friendly to me.

In the struggle between Spain and the insurgents, the deaths have been many and greater among the natives. First, because the Spaniards have been much better armed. Second, because the Spaniards killed many noncombatants, old men, women, and children, while the natives refrained from such barbarities.

From consensus of opinions of many reliable people, I estimate Spanish forces here about as follows:

First. Naval force, in ships annihilated in the notable battle of Manila Bay, in which 10 Spanish war ships were burned and sunk—2 auxiliary gunboats, ditto—and about 30 steamers, schooners, tugs, etc., captured.

Second. About 4,000 Spanish infantry, nearly a half of whom are in hospitals.

Third. About 6,000 native troops under Spanish officers; but if such officers were deported their soldiers would eagerly follow our flag.

An insurgent leader, Major Gonzales, reported to me last week on the Olympia that they had 37,000 troops under arms, good and bad, surrounding Manila, endeavoring to cooperate with us. In the main they are very poorly armed, but have about 6,000 rifles, taken from the Spaniards. They have captured the entire railroad line and the River Pasig, thus cutting off supply lines, while we, by cutting off supply by bay and sea, can soon starve Manila into surrender.

These natives are eager to be organized and led by United States officers, and the members of their cabinet visited me and gave assurance that all would swear allegiance to and cheerfully follow our flag. They are brave, submissive, and cheaply provided for.

To show their friendliness for me as our nation's only representative in this part of the world, I last week went on shore at Cavite with British consul, in his launch, to show the destruction wrought by our fleet. As soon as natives found me out, they crowded around me, hats off, shouting, "Viva los Americanos," thronged about me by hundreds to shake either hand, even several at a time, men, women, and children striving to get even a finger to shake. So I moved half a mile, shaking continuously with both hands. The British consul, a smiling spectator, said he never before saw such an evidence of friendship. Two thousand escorted me to the launch amid hurrahs of good feeling for our nation, hence I must conclude:

First. Our squadron can force surrender in a day. Spaniards are all cooped up in Manila.

Second. Spanish officers of native regiments away, these 6,000, together with selections from the 37,000 insurgents, can give us ample land force, and can be well armed with rifles of Spanish soldiers and from barracks and arsenals.

Third. Few United States troops will be needed for conquest and fewer still for occupancy. Expulsion of Spaniards, naval, civil, military, and clerics, will remove all discord and danger, and civil government, crude in the beginning, but better than the present, will be easy and be well received, while native priests, of which there are many, can fully and with perfect acceptability meet all religious requirements so far as present established religion is concerned.

All natives, all foreigners other than Spanish, and certain Spaniards in mercantile and retired life will aid us to every extent. The people crave a change of flag. Hence I believe ample assurances are at hand that civil government by us will be easy of organization and gratefully received by the people.

My communications to your Department are, these war days, supra consular, but on other lines I endeavor to serve our fleet and thus serve our nation.

All rejoice over the merited promotion of our commodore to the rank of rear-admiral, but every man of the fleet proved a hero, and it seems as if the shield of Providence warded off the enemy's shot, leaving our men unharmed, our ships and guns intact, and gave us the most important and unique victory of history.

The student of the next century will read with pride that the right arm of Spain was broken at the battle of "Manila Bay," and from this must come the acquisition of these islands, many times more extensive, more populous, and more valuable than Cuba, or else their capture will force Spain to conditions of peace on basis of honor, so much sought by our nation.

I have, etc.,

OSCAR F. WILLIAMS,
United States Consul.

Mr. Williams to Mr. Day.

Special.] U. S. S. BALTIMORE,
CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
MANILA BAY, OFF CAVITE,
Manila, Philippine Islands, May 24, 1898.

SIR: I have the honor to report successful efforts on the part of the insurgents of these islands in preparation for more successful war against Spain.

Officers have visited me during the darkness of night to inform the fleet and me of their operations, and to report increase of strength.

At a conference with General Aguinaldo, the head of the movement, I was told that they had now above 4,500 Mauser rifles taken from the Spaniards, and had also abundant ammunition. Until the present they have been fatally crippled in these respects.

Last week Major Gonzales captured two buffalo cart loads of rifle ammunition from the Spaniards. To-day I executed a power of attorney whereby General Aguinaldo releases to his attorneys in fact $400,000, now in bank in Hongkong, so that money therefrom can pay for 5,000 stand of arms bought there and expected here to-morrow.

The same sources informed me that about 37,000 insurgents stand ready to aid United States forces, and General Aguinaldo's headquarters were this a. m. at 7 o'clock surrounded by 500 to 1,000 men eager to enlist. I was there at that hour and saw the men.

My relations with all are cordial, and I manage to keep them so pro bono publico.

When General Merritt arrives he will find large auxiliary land forces adapted to his service and used to this climate.

I am, sir,

OSCAR F. WILLIAMS,
United States Consul.

Mr. Williams to Mr. Day.

Special.] U. S. S. BALTIMORE,
CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Manila, Philippine Islands, June 16, 1898.

SIR: I have the honor to report that since our squadron destroyed the Spanish fleet on May 1, the insurgent forces have been most active and almost uniformly successful in their many encounters with the Crown forces of Spain. Gen. Emilio Aguinaldo, the insurgent chief, who was deported late in 1897, returned recently to Cavite and resumed direction of insurgent forces. He is not permitted by his people to personally lead in battle, but from headquarters governs all military movements. He told me to-day that, since his return, his forces had captured nearly 5,000 prisoners, nearly 4,000 of whom were Spaniards, and all of whom had rifles when taken. General Aguinaldo has now about 10,500 rifles and 8 fieldpieces, with 8,000 more rifles, 2 Maxim guns and a dynamite gun bought in China and now in transit. The insurgents have defeated the Spaniards at all points except at fort near Matate, and hold not only North Luzon to the suburbs of Manila, but Bantanyos province also and the bay coast entire, save the city of Manila.

While the Spaniards cruelly and barbarously slaughter Filipinos taken in arms, and often noncombatants, women, and children, the insurgent victors, following American example, spare life, protect the helpless, and nurse, feed, and care for Spaniards taken prisoners and for Spanish wounded as kindly as they care for the wounded fallen from their own ranks.

For future advantage I am maintaining cordial relations with General Aguinaldo, having stipulated submissiveness to our forces when treating for their return here. Last Sunday, 12th, they held a council to form provisional government. I was urged to attend, but thought best to decline. A form of government was adopted, but General Aguinaldo told me to-day that his friends all hoped that the Philippines would be held as a colony of United States of America.

It has been my effort to maintain harmony with insurgents in order to exercise greater influence hereafter when we reorganize government.

Manila is hemmed in; foreigners other than Spaniards have, by kindness of Rear-Admiral Dewey, been allowed to leave the beleaguered city and are cared for on merchant ships in the bay.

The Baltimore leaves early to-morrow to meet the troop ships northeast of Luzon, and incidentally to reconnoiter Dagupan Bay, the northern terminus of the Manila railroad, for Spanish cruisers and merchant ships.

We are impatient, made doubly so by the miraculous battle of May 1, which after inspection of waters and wrecks proved to be more signal than detailed in my dispatch on that subject.

The Spanish fleet, comprised of the following vessels, was annihilated so far as Spain is concerned, viz: Cruiser (flagship) Reina Christina, cruiser Don Antonio de Ulloa, cruiser Don Juan de Austria, cruiser Isle de Cuba, cruiser Isle de Luzon, gunboat General Lezo, gunboat Marques del Duero, gunboat Velasco, gunboat Argos, and armed transport Isle de Mindanao.

The above destroyed and sunk; the armed transport Manila was captured and soon appears as a United States cruiser, and the cruiser Callao has since been captured and augments our fleet.

The superb cruisers Isle de Cuba and Isle de Luzon were almost uninjured when sunk, by scuttling, to defeat capture. These are rich prizes which, later on, I hope to see flying our flag. We have had neither death nor serious sickness since we came. Manila is at the mercy of our fleet, and I believe its capture may be effected, so far as the fleet's part is concerned, without the loss of a man or the disabling of a vessel. Rear-Admiral Dewey only awaits troops to insure order and good government once we are in possession. We fear the city may fall too soon. For this reason Admiral Dewey asked me to remain here, where he could command such service as I may be able to render in event of his taking the city.

I expect that on July 4 we will celebrate in Manila under the folds of "Old Glory," and write in living letters a page of history that this magnificent insular empire has become a part and parcel of the United States of America.

I have the honor, etc.,

OSCAR F. WILLIAMS,
United States Consul.

Mr. Cridler to Mr. Williams.

No. 18.] WASHINGTON, August 4, 1898.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your special dispatch of the 15th of June last, copy of which has been sent to the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy. Your course, while maintaining amicable relations with the insurgents, in abstaining from any participation in the adoption of their so-called provisional government, is approved.

Respectfully, yours,

THOS. W. CRIDLER,
Third Assistant Secretary.

Mr. Williams to Mr. Day.

Special.] U. S. S. BALTIMORE, MANILA BAY,
Manila, Philippine Islands, July 2, 1898.

SIR: I have the honor to report the arrival here on June 30 of 2,500 United States troops under command of General Anderson, the flotilla being convoyed by the Charleston.

To General Anderson and all I am rendering every possible assistance, and have been asked by him to treat with General Aguinaldo as to American interests.

Relations between General Anderson and Aguinaldo.

HEADQUARTERS FIRST BRIGADE,
UNITED STATES EXPEDITIONARY FORCES,
Cavite Arsenal, Philippine Islands, July 4, 1898.

Señor Don EMILIO AGUINALDO,
Commanding Philippine Forces, Cavite, Luzon.

GENERAL: I have the honor to inform you that the United States of America, whose land forces I have the honor to command in this vicinity, being at war with the Kingdom of Spain, has entire sympathy and most friendly sentiments for the native people of the Philippine Islands.

For these reasons I desire to have the most amicable relations with you, and to have you and your people cooperate with us in military operations against the Spanish forces.

In our operations it has become necessary for us to occupy the town of Cavite as a base of operations. In doing this, I do not wish to interfere with your residence here and the exercise by yourself and other native citizens of all functions and privileges not inconsistent with military rule.

I would be pleased to be informed at once of any misconduct of soldiers under my command, as it is the intention of my Government to maintain order, and to treat all citizens with justice, courtesy, and kindness.

I have therefore the honor to ask your excellency to instruct your officials not to interfere with my officers in the performance of their duties and not to assume that they can not visit Cavite without permission.

Assuring you again of my most friendly sentiment and distinguished consideration, I am, with all respect,

THOMAS M. ANDERSON.
Brigadier-General, U. S. Volunteers, Commanding.

Brig. Gen. THOMAS M. ANDERSON,
Commanding the United States Volunteers.

GENERAL: Interpreting the sentiments of the Philippine people, I have the honor to express to your excellency my most profound gratefulness for the sympathy and amicable sentiments which the natives of these islands inspire the great North American nation and your excellency.

I also thank most profoundly your desire of having friendly relations with us, and of treating us with justice, courtesy, and kindness, which is also our constant wish to prove the same, and special satisfaction whenever occasion represents.

I have already ordered my people not to interfere in the least with your officers and men, orders which I shall reiterate to prevent their being unfulfilled; hoping that you will inform me of whatever misconduct that may be done by those in my command, so as to reprimand them and correspond with your wishes.

I beg of your excellency to accept in return the assurance of my most respectable consideration.

I remain, respectfully, EMILIO AGUINALDO.

HEADQUARTERS FIRST BRIGADE,
UNITED STATES EXPEDITIONARY FORCES,
Cavite Arsenal, Philippine Islands, July 6, 1898.

Señor Don EMILIO AGUINALDO Y FAMY,
Commanding Philippine Forces.

GENERAL: I am encouraged by the friendly sentiments expressed by your excellency in your welcome letter received on the 5th instant to endeavor to come to a definite understanding, which I hope will be advantageous to both.

Very soon we expect a large addition to our forces, and it must be apparent to you as a military officer that we will require much more room to camp our soldiers, and also storeroom for our supplies. For this I would like to have your excellency's advice and cooperation, as you are best acquainted with the resources of this country.

It must be apparent to you that we do not intend to remain here inactive, but to move promptly against our common enemy; but for a short time we must organize and land supplies and also retain a place for storing them near our fleet and transports.

I am solicitous to avoid any conflict of authority which may result from having two sets of military officers exercising command in the same place.

I am also anxious to avoid sickness by taking sanitary precautions. Your own medical officers have been making voluntary inspections with mine and fear epidemic disease if the vicinity is not made clean. Would it not be well to have prisoners work to this end under the advice of the surgeons?

I again renew my assurances of distinguished consideration.

I am, with great respect,

THOMAS M. ANDERSON,
Brigadier-General, U. S. Volunteers, Commanding.

Beginning and progress of the revolution (from Captain Green's testimony before the Paris commissioners).

An insurrection had been in progress from August, 1896, to December, 1897. Unable to suppress it, the Government made a written treaty with the insurgent leaders, paying them a large sum of money and promising to introduce various reforms on condition that they would leave the country. Hardly had the Spanish officials recovered from this when the appalling disaster of the destruction of their fleet occurred under their very eyes.

Then followed in rapid succession the naval blockade, the arrival of the insurgent leaders from Hongkong, the raising of an insurgent army, which blockaded Manila on the land side, and finally the American troops. At the end of one hundred and four days after the destruction of the Spanish fleet the city surrendered to a combined land and naval attack of the American forces. On the day after the capitulation the American commander in chief issued his proclamation establishing a military government, appointed a military governor, a minister of finance, a collector of customs, collector of internal revenue, postmaster, and judge of the provost court; took possession of all public funds (about $900,000) and all public offices, and as rapidly as possible put this government in operation.

The machinery of the Spanish Government was thoroughly disorganized when we entered Manila. The courts of justice, except the inferior criminal courts, had not been in session since early in May; the officials had been cut off from communication with the other islands and with Spain for over three months; there had been no customs to collect, and owing to the entire suspension of business, but little internal revenue; a forced loan of $2,000,000 for military purposes had been extracted from the Spanish-Philippine Bank, and yet the troops were several months in arrears of pay; all Government officers outside the walled city had been moved to temporary quarters within the walls, and their records had been lost or thrown into confusion; the officials, seeing the inevitable end in sight, were intent only on planning for their return to Spain. * * *

The situation thus created is without precedent in American history. When Scott captured the City of Mexico it was ackowledged on both sides that his occupation was only to be temporary, and there were no insurgents to deal with. When the Americans entered California they found only a scanty population, who were soon outnumbered by the American immigrants. But in the Philippine Islands there is a population of more than 7,000,000, governed by an alien race whose representatives present in the islands, including military and naval forces, clergy, and civil employees, do not exceed 30,000 in number. Against this Government an insurrection is in progress which claims to have been successful in provinces containing a population of about 2,000,000. The city and province of Manila, with a population of 400,000 more, have been captured and occupied by a foreign army, but whether its occupation is to be temporary or permanent has not yet been decided. * * *

Between 2,000 and 3,000 Spanish native troops surrendered to it during the months of June and July; it constantly annoyed and harassed the Spaniards in the trenches, keeping them up at night and wearing them out with fatigue; and it invested Manila early in July so completely that all supplies were cut off, and the inhabitants, as well as the Spanish troops, were forced to live on horse and buffalo meat, and the Chinese population on cats and dogs. It captured the waterworks of Manila and cut off the water supply, and if it had been in the dry season would have inflicted great suffering on the inhabitants for lack of water.

The results, it is true, were obtained against a dispirited army containing a considerable number of native troops of doubtful loyalty. Yet from August, 1896, to April, 1897, they fought 25,000 of the best regular troops sent out from Spain, inflicting on them a loss of over 150 officers and 2,500 men killed and wounded, and they suffered still greater losses themselves. Nevertheless, from daily contact with them for six weeks, I am very confident that no such results could have been obtained against an American army, which would have driven them back to the hills and reduced them to a petty guerrilla warfare. If they attack the American army this will certainly be the result; and while these guerrilla bands might give some trouble so long as their ammunition lasted, yet with our navy guarding the coasts and our army pursuing them on land, it would not be long before they were reduced to subjection.

Insurgent civil administration.—In August, 1896, an insurrection broke out in Cavite under the leadership of Emilio Aguinaldo, and soon spread to other provinces on both sides of Manila. It continued with varying sucesses on both sides, and the trial and execution of numerous insurgents, until December, 1897, when the Governor-General, Primo de Rivera, entered into written agreement with Aguinaldo, the substance of the document, which is in possession of Senor Felipe Agoncillo, who accompanies me to Washington, being attached hereto and marked A. In brief, it required that Aguinaldo and the other insurgent leaders should leave the country, the Government agreeing to pay them $800,000 in silver and promising to introduce numerous reforms, including representation in the Spanish Cortes, freedom of the press, general amnesty for all insurgents, and the expulsion or secularization of the monastic orders.

Aguinaldo and his associates went to Hongkong and Singapore. A portion of the money, $400,000, was deposited in banks at Hongkong, and a lawsuit soon arose between Aguinaldo and one of his subordinate chiefs, named Artacho, which is interesting on account of the very honorable position taken by Aguinaldo. Artacho sued for a division of the money among the insurgents according to rank. Aguinaldo claimed that the money was a trust fund, and was to remain on deposit until it was seen whether the Spaniards would carry out their promised reforms, and if they failed to do so it was to be used to defray the expenses of a new insurrection. The suit was settled out of court by paying Artacho $5,000.

No steps have been taken to introduce the reforms: more than 2,000 insurgents, who had been deported to Fernando Po and other places, are still in confinement, and Aguinaldo is now using the money to carry on the operations of the present insurrection.

On the 24th day of April Aguinaldo met the United States consul and others at Singapore, and offered to begin a new insurrection in conjunction with the operations of the United States Navy at Manila. This was telegraphed to Admiral Dewey, and by his consent, or at his request, Aguinaldo left Singapore for Hongkong on April 26; and when the McCulloch went to Hongkong early in May to carry the news of Admiral Dewey's victory, it took Aguinaldo and 17 other revolutionary chiefs on board and brought them to Manila Bay. They soon after landed at Cavite, and the Admiral allowed them to take such guns, ammunition, and stores as he did not require for himself. With these, and some other arms which he had brought from Hongkong, Aguinaldo armed his followers, who rapidly assembled at Cavite, and in a few weeks he began moving against the Spaniards. Part of them surrendered, giving him more arms, and the others retreated to Manila.

Soon afterwards two ships, which were the private property of Senor Agoncillo and other insurgent sympathizers, were converted into cruisers and sent with insurgent troops to Subig Bay and other places to capture provinces outside of Manila. They were very successful, the native militia in Spanish service capitulating with their arms in nearly every case without serious resistance. On the 18th of June Aguinaldo issued a proclamation from Cavite establishing a dictatorial government, with himself as dictator. In each village or pueblo a chief (jefe) was to be elected, and in each ward a headman (cabeza); also in each pueblo three delegates—one of police, one of justice, and one of taxes. These were to constitute the junta or assembly, and after consulting the junta the chiefs of pueblos were to elect a chief of province and three councilors—one of police, one of justice, and one of taxes. They were also to elect one or more representatives from each province to form the revolutionary congress.

This was followed on June 20 by a decree giving more detailed instructions in regard to the elections. On June 23 another decree followed changing the title of the government from dictatorial to revolutionary, and of the chief officer from dictator to president; announcing a cabinet, with a minister of foreign affairs, marine, and commerce, another of war and public works, another of police and internal order, justice, instruction, and hygiene, and another of taxes, agriculture, and manufactures; the powers of the president and congress were defined, and a code of military justice was formulated.

On the same date a manifesto was issued to the world explaining the reasons and purposes of the revolution. On June 27 another decree was issued containing instructions in regard to elections. On August 6 an address was issued to foreign governments stating that the revolutionary government was in operation and control in 15 provinces, and that in response to the petition of the duly elected chiefs of these provinces an appeal is made for recognition of belligerency and independence. Translations of these various documents are all appended, marked B, C, D, E, F, G, and H.

In the province of Cavite and that portion of the province of Manila outside of the city and its suburbs which was occupied by the insurgent troops, as well as those of the United States, their military forces, military headquarters, etc., were very much in evidence, occupying the principal houses and churches in every village and hamlet, but there were no signs of civil government or administration. It was reported, however, that Aguinaldo's agents were levying taxes, or forced contributions, not only in the outside villages, but (after we entered Manila) by means of secret agents in the market places of the city itself. At Aguinaldo's headquarters, in Bacoor, there were signs of activity and business, and it was reported that his cabinet officers were in constant session there. Aguinaldo himself never failed to claim all the prerogatives due to his alleged position as the de facto ruler of the country.

The nation to which they all turn is America, and their ideal is a Philippine republic under American protection, such as they have heard is to be granted to Cuba. But when it comes to defining their ideas of protection and the respective rights and duties of each under it—what portion of the government is to be administered by them and what portion by us; how the revenues are to be collected, and in what proportion the expenses are to be divided—they have no clearly defined ideas at all; nor is it to be expected that they should have, after generations of Spanish rule, without any experience in self-government.

The United States Government, through its naval commander, has to some extent made use of them for a distinct military purpose, viz, to harass and annoy the Spanish troops, to wear them out in the trenches, to blockade Manila on the land side, and to do as much damage as possible to the Spanish Government prior to the arrival of our troops; and for this purpose the Admiral allowed them to take arms and munitions which he had captured at Cavite, and their ships to pass in and out of Manila Bay in their expeditions against other provinces. But the Admiral has been very careful to give Aguinaldo no assurances of recognition and no pledges or promises of any description. The services which Aguinaldo and his adherents rendered in preparing the way for attack on Manila are certainly entitled to consideration; but, after all, they were small in comparison with what was done by our own fleet and army.

Bradford's testimony before Peace Commission at Paris.

Q. What do you know of the disposition of the natives beyond Luzon?
A. Only what I read.
Q. Do you know that this insurrection is confined to the island of Luzon?
A. No, sir.
Q. It has been?
A. The Spanish have never had full control of the southern islands of the group.
Q. No one has ever had control of Mindanao and the other islands except the Mohammedan natives there; they have never submitted to any civilized government?
A. The Spaniards have suppressed piracy in the Sulu Sea.
Q. But the natives have never submitted to the Spaniards?
A. No, sir; I believe not, outside of certain fortified towns.

Mr. FRYE:

Q. I would like to ask just one question in that line. Suppose the United States in the progress of that war found the leader of the present Philippine rebellion an exile from his country in Hongkong, and sent for him and brought him to the islands in an American ship, and then furnished him 4,000 or 5,000 stands of arms, and allowed him to purchase as many more stands of arms in Hongkong, and accepted his aid in conquering Luzon, what kind of a nation, in the eyes of the world, would we appear to be to surrender Aguinaldo and his insurgents to Spain to be dealt with as they please?

A. We become responsible for everything he has done; he is our ally, and we are bound to protect him.

Their inefficiency (and the creditable work of the insurgents as well) is further proved by the fact that they were driven by the natives from Cavite twenty-odd miles into the defenses of Manila, with never a successful attack, never a capture of arms or men. All the success was on the native side, and yet the Spaniards surrendered between 7,000 and 8,000 men, well armed, plenty of ammunition, and in good physical condition. The excuse of the latter may be that their enemy was in small bands; but they never captured one of these, and the small bands drove them to their walls. Jaudenes, the acting Captain-General, in reply to Merritt and Dewey's notice to remove his noncombatants, acknowledged that the insurrectionists surrounded the city, and that he could not move women, children, etc., out. (His fear and solicitude about the natives entering the city when I received the surrender of Manila were almost painful to witness.) This admission demonstrates as well the military ability shown by the Filipinos, whose characteristics I will now enumerate.

Aguinaldo went to Cavite, under the permission of Admiral Dewey, in reply to a telegram sent by Spencer Pratt, esq., our consul-general at Singapore, who offered that chief money for his expenses. The offer was declined. After arrival (on one of our ships) he went ashore, accompanied by 13 staff officers, to organize his army; but no adherents appeared the first day, and Aguinaldo, rather discouraged, meditated returning to Hongkong. I think Dewey advised him to make another effort, at the same time saying that he must leave the public buildings at Cavite, where he had made his headquarters. Soon, from across the bay and from all sides, men gathered. The fact that Dewey permitted the armed men to move from the surrounding districts and for the rebels to take arms (not many, says the Admiral) in the arsenal was the only help we gave him, excepting, of course, the most important destruction of the Spanish navy. From that time the military operations and the conduct of the insurgents have been most creditable. Positions taken and the movements of troops show great ability on the part of some leader—I do not say it was necessarily Aguinaldo, but he gave the directions.

The CHAIRMAN:

Q. How many men did he get together?
A. His forces went around the city, taking the waterworks and the north part of the city, and running up the railroad. I asked that question of several, and the opinions differed widely—all the way from 8,000 to 30,000 or 40,000 men.
Q. Do you think he had as many as 8,000 men before the surrender?
A. Yes, sir; the environment of the city took a great many men. There is a vast extent of country there, including the waterworks, and running around the city, and they certainly had to have more than that to do so.
Q. How many arms did Dewey turn over to them?
A. I never knew exactly. I asked him that question, and he said a very few.
Q. Where did they get the rest of their arms?
A. Some captured from the Spanish, some brought to him by deserters, and there were some shipments of arms from Hongkong—I believe Americans brought them in—and they have lately taken some to Batangas, in the southern part, and have taken some new Maxim guns in there too.

Mr. GRAY:

Q. To the insurgents?
A. Yes.
Q. Since the capitulation?
A. Yes. They changed the name of a vessel and used it. She had had a Luzon name, the Fusig, and they changed it to the Maby. Dewey sent down and seized the boat, and the insurgents followed to Manila Bay, hoping to reclaim it. In other respects their demands, from their point of view, have not been unreasonable, and show a proper appreciation of the status.

STATEMENT RESUMED.

The day after the surrender (August 13) four representatives of Aguinaldo called on General Merritt, who assured them in general terms that "we are the friends of the Filipinos." At that time they occupied a portion of Manila. We soon demanded that they should give that up, to which Aguinaldo's representative agreed, but in seeking confirmation from him the condition was made that in case we gave up the country they should be restored to the positions then occupied and which they had taken greatly by their own merits. However, matters have been amicably settled. Aguinaldo's headquarters are at Malolos, 24 miles up the railroad. His troops control all the settled part of the island (except Manila), as well as much of the southern country.

The CHAIRMAN:

Q. What do you mean by the "southern country"—those islands below?
A. Yes.

Their conduct to their Spanish prisoners has been deserving of the praise of all the world. With hatred of priests and Spaniards, fairly held on account of the conditions before narrated, and with every justification to a savage mind for the most brutal revenge, I have heard no instance of torture, murder, or brutality since we have been in the country.

The CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did you ever talk with Admiral Dewey about his relations with Aguinaldo?
A. Yes, sir. He read me a copy of his dispatch in answer to the one in which he is asked the question whether he had made any promises, and he said he had not. Aguinaldo went down with his conference, without doubt, and the Admiral allowed armed people to cross the bay and join him and made no remonstrance.
Q. Did he furnish him any arms?
A. He says not, except the few furnished them from Cavite. Foreman, in his article, makes the statement that he has a treaty with Aguinaldo, and I went one morning and left the article with the Admiral to read, and he said it was not true.
Q. This relation—whatever Admiral Dewey did—took place before he got the dispatch of inquiry from the Navy Department—some time before?
A. Yes.
Q. How far does the Admiral say he encouraged Aguinaldo?
A. I do not think he says he gave him any encouragement, except that he rather dissuaded him from returning to Hongkong when he was discouraged.
Q. Did you get that statement from Dewey?
A. Yes. Aguinaldo was rather discouraged when any of the people failed to come to his banner on the first day. That dispatch also included a statement that he knew well the Filipinos and the Cubans, and that the Filipinos were a far superior people—I think that was in that dispatch; it was in one.

Mr. FRYE:

Q. Were they of material assistance to us?
A. Very great. If the protocol had not been signed, I think the Spanish at home would have insisted upon their army doing something. They dismissed Augustin because he was not disposed to fight, and I think if they had not had this experience of having been driven back into the city and the water cut off, so even that Jaudenes said he could not remove his noncombatants, the Government would have insisted on his making a fight, and he could have made a very good one, for his position was strong, if they had any fight in them at all. But every place had been taken from them by the Filipinos, who managed their advances and occupation of the country in an able manner.

The CHAIRMAN:

Q. The insurrection had been ended in December, 1897, by an arrangement under which money was paid in Hongkong and certain reforms promised. Were these promises ever carried out?
A. Not at all, and Primo de Rivera stated lately in the Cortes that he never made any. I was surprised at reading that statement.

STATEMENT RESUMED.

I talked with Spanish prisoners at Tarlac, an important military station on the line of the railroad, and they said that they had had good treatment only. The wives of two officers had lately visited their husbands in jail (one at Dagupan, 123 miles north), and gave same testimony. Aguinaldo, in a letter of August 1 to our late consul at Manila, Mr. Williams, said: "Say to the Government at Washington that the Filipino people abominate savagery; that in the midst of their past misfortunes they have learned to love liberty, order, justice, and civil life." I believe the natives to be brave (under good leadership), most tolerant of fatigue and hunger, and amenable to command and discipline, if justice and fair dealing rule. They are very temperate, as most of the natives of the East are. I have never seen a drunken one, and this with the example of our soldiers, whom they imitate in everything else; very quiet, no loud quarrels, very good house servants and cooks.

* * * * * * *

And now comes the vital question, What is to be done with these islands; and if we hold them, what form of government is to prevail? Whatever grave doubts one may have as to colonial extension on the part of America, we have gone too far, either by design or chance, to recede. It can not be denied that we owe it as a duty to the natives and to humanity that the islands should not be restored to Spain (even if they were, they could not be held for a year). Any division of them is absolutely impracticable. This would induce constant friction, the ruin of Manila as the great commercial center; the important products would be shipped direct from the southern islands and goods sent directly there in exchange. One owner must hold the whole country and prescribe uniform duties and government.

I will digress here to say that the British at Manila, at Hongkong, Singapore—all over the East—are more than anxious we shall hold the islands. There is such a contrast in the expression of good will and admiration of our country with the feelings of only a few years ago. It seems to me that every day for the last six weeks some Englishman has said to me in the strongest terms, "There should be an Anglo-American alliance." They speak in the warmest terms of praise and surprise at our moderation, absence of looting, thefts, and every kind of outrage after the taking of Manila. Strange that they should make so much of a thing which, to our officers and people, seemed so obviously the proper and necessary thing. A few days before the surrender some British and other merchants and bankers came to our transports, asking from General Merritt safeguards, or the assurance of protection for the houses and persons of foreign residents.

I assured Mr. Wood, at the head of one of the largest houses (Smith, Bell & Co.'s, that they were in no danger. Noticing a look of incredulity, I said: "You don't believe me?" "Well, I think the men getting away from their officers will take possession of the spirit shops and commit outrages." I replied: "It is not possible; it is not in accord with the temper of our people. If you will consider our civil war, where after the terrible losses, running over four years, no punishment of a single person or appropriation of property was made, you may believe that we shall behave in no other way as the result of this little affair." I doubt if anything has inspired so much the respect of foreigners for us as this, which seems to me so natural a thing.

To take all the islands and ignore the natives would be impracticable and unwise.

On October 25 I went, in the company of H. L. Higgins, general manager of the Manila Railway, Limited, to Malolos for an interview arranged the day before with Aguinaldo. I found his headquarters were in a very nice house, ten minutes' drive from the railway station; a guard of twenty or thirty soldiers in the courtyard below.

We were soon ushered by one of his officers, who spoke English, to the waiting room upstairs, and I met Buen Camino, a wise-looking counselor, whom I met at Ayuntamiento the day after the fall of Manila. He carried us to the presence of the insurgent leader and president, who was dressed, contrary to his usual daily garb, in a black smoking jacket, of low-cut waistcoat and trousers, both black, large white tie—in fact, the evening dress common at our clubs and during the summer.

Buen Camino left us. I started the talk by announcing to Aguinaldo that I was to leave in a few days to appear before the Peace Commission, and that I had a very friendly feeling for the Filipinos and admiration for many of their good qualities, their quiet, cleanliness, temperance, and great imitative power, and a possibility of learning almost any profession or business; that I would like to be able to present to the commission his and his people's views and demands and what relation they expected to hold to the United States in case we decided to keep the islands.

Aguinaldo replied, rather naively, that his people were divided into two parties—those in favor of absolute independence and those of an American protectorate; that the parties are about equal; that he is waiting to see who will have the majority, in that case to take his position. I pointed out to him that it would probably be useless to try to bring those in favor of absolute independence to any change of opinion, but they must consider that they are without any navy and without capital, which is greatly needed for the development of the country; that the Philippine government alone did not possess the element of strength to insure the retention of the islands without the assistance of other governments. They would be at the mercy of any of half a dozen powers striving to take either a part or the whole of the islands, and they must consider that their greatest prosperity would come by the gradual accession of power under American auspices.

He said: "But the civilized nations of the world would see that our possessions were not taken from us." I replied: "How has it been in China, where England, Russia, France, Germany, etc., all strive to control territory?" To this he could make no reply. I further asked what that side would expect America, acting the rôle of protector, to do. He said: "To furnish the navy, while the Filipinos held all the country and administered civil offices with its own people." "And what then would America get from this," said I. "That would be a detail," he said, "which would be settled hereafter."

I asked how far they controlled Luzon and other islands. "Almost entirely," he said. That the different bands, little by little, were expressing their desire to join him. The Igorrottos had sent in some of their leaders the day before and were acting with him. That he had had three representatives from Iloilo within a few days on the same mission.

We pursued all this subject of a protectorate for some time without getting any nearer any satisfactory result. Mr. Higgins felt that Aguinaldo had been simply repeating a lesson, but I did not feel so sure of that. He said that he had had many Americans to interview him, most of them reporters, I fancy, and he had always told them the same thing. Thereupon I stated that this was quite a different case. "I am ordered, as an officer of the United States Army, to proceed to Paris and give evidence on points which may be of vital interest to you." After that his tone was different. Buen Camino returned, and Aguinaldo reported to him everything he had said to us. After a little talk between the two, Buen Camino said he, and he was sure the president, was in favor of an American protectorate, and seemed to approve the suggestion that we should have the nucleus of an army; that his people should be joined to it, filling the places of minor officers; and the possibility and the hope within a few years that they should fill the most important civil and military functions.

Buen Camino said I could be certain that if a protectorate were granted that they would do their best to have it accepted by their people on the lines that I have stated, agreeing with me fully that to hold one island and giving the others to other powers would be most unfortunate, and not to be considered.

They expressed pleasure at my having come to them, feeling that they had been rather neglected by the Americans.

This I dictated hastily just after the visit, and it does not give the impression which the interview left upon me—a great desire for our protection, for the improvement of their people materially and intellectually, the wish to send their young people to America for education.

Mr. GRAY:

Q. What sort of looking people are the insurgents?

A. They are somewhat undersized, are fairly good in appearance, are brave, will stand any amount of hunger and hardship, and, well led, would be very good soldiers. The country on the line of railroad is divided into four parts or zones. There was one General Macabulus, whose headquarters were at Tarlac, and it was said that Aguinaldo rather dreaded his popularity and wanted to transfer him. There was good feeling between them, however, and he sent down by Higgins $6,000 as a contribution. This was Mexican, of course. In all my talk it will be of Mexican dollars, about 47 cents' worth in our money or in gold. That trip was most interesting, but I have stated most of these things in my little story. We were the first officers who had been anywhere in the island outside the immediate environs of Manila.

The next Sunday, in company with a member of one of the chief mercantile houses and the senior British medical officer at Hongkong, Colonel Evatt, we went up the River Pasig on the launch of the former. We went up about 28 miles to the laguna. Paixanang would have been better to see, but time would not permit. We went to Banos, a health resort. There is an enormous tract of land on the laguna on the market, held by the priests. They wish to sell it for $1,700,000. It is an enormously productive country. You pass cascos loaded with cocoanuts and enormous quantities of nipa thatching for roofs. At this time I was collector of the port, and during this time I heard all sorts of expressions, and I think I had a very fair opportunity, being amused with the natives and studying their peculiarities, to form a fair judgment. I stand a little isolated in my opinions, however, perhaps. Men so quickly dismiss the natives from their minds as simply "niggers" and "savages," but when you think of all they have done you must give them credit for great capacity. I think there is a very good authority on this subject, Sir Frank Swettenham, of the British Straits Settlements colony, from whom I have a letter written to Mr. Pratt, our consul at Singapore. Sir Frank Swettenham has written a very clever book of local stories.

Mr. DAY:

Q. Does he live in the Philippines?

A. No, sir; in the Straits Settlements in the Malay Peninsula. His letter is as follows: !

CARCOSA, SELANGOR, MALAY PENINSULA, October 28, 1898.

DEAR MR. SPENCER PRATT: I send you all I have at present available. It may be all you want.

The Philippines are Malays, with more intelligence, more education, more courage, perhaps, than their confrères in the Peninsula.

In one sense they would be easier to govern, because they have been for many years in contact with white men and understand their ways. Moreover, the majority are not Mohammedans.

But, on the other hand, they have aspirations for political institutions and the management of affairs without the necessary experience, perhaps without the essential qualities, to secure success.

I should say that our experiment in the Malay Peninsula might be successfully repeated in the Philippines, provided that the controlling power made it clearly understood at the start that they meant to control and not only to advise and educate.

If that point were never in doubt, and the means of enforcing authority were in evidence for a short time, the rest would be easy, and I firmly believe the results would surpass all anticipations.

Yours, sincerely,

FRANK SWETTENHAM.

[From speech of Senator HOAR, January 9, 1900.]

At Aparri I witnessed a ceremony which at the time I considered pregnant with significance, and I have seen no reason since for changing my opinion. During our entire journey we had noticed the existence of a distinct civil and military government. The civil government was simple and efficient, consisting of four officials for each province and four for each town. The military government consisted of an officer in command of a military district, having under his orders one officer as military governor of each province and one as governor of each important town. The military government was the dominant one. We remarked on this condition several times, and were told that it would last only during a state of war. At Aparri we received proof of the sincerity of this statement. Word had been received from Hongkong that our commissioners at Paris, negotiating the terms of the treaty of peace, had plainly indicated that it was their intention not to return the islands to Spain. Relieved from their great apprehension of this action, the Filipino population began at once to see rosy visions of peace descending on their war-torn country. Steps were immediately taken to adjust existing conditions to the new state of things. Colonel Tirona, the governor of the northeastern military district, took the lead by relinquishing the control of affairs in the provinces comprised in his district in favor of a civil official chosen by the people. I was present at the impressive ceremony which solemnized this change in the province of Cagayan. The ceremony took place in the cathedral at Aparri and was attended by all the local officials of the towns of the province, as well as by any military officers that could be spared from their duties. Colonel Tirona placed the usual insignia of office—a gold-headed cane—in the hands of the governor-elect at the close of a short speech, in which he said that now that a state of peace seemed probable he desired to divest himself of the unusual authority that it had been necessary for him temporarily to exercise and to assume his proper position as a servant—not a ruler—of the people. The governor, in reply, expressed his thanks to the Colonel and to all of the expeditionary forces for the incalculable service they had rendered the people of the province in freeing them from Spanish rule and declared the purpose of the people to expend the last drop of their blood, if necessary, in defending the liberty thus gained against the encroachments of any nation whatsoever. The governor then took the oath of office, being followed in turn by each of the three other provincial officials, the heads of the departments of justice, revenue, and the police. It was the Colonel's intention to have a similar ceremony performed in each of the other provinces under his control. Had the Filipino government been allowed to work out its own salvation, this movement could hardly have failed to become historical.

At Apparri we saw proof also of the extent of Aguinaldo's authority. Four natives had been tried for robbery and attempted murder and had been sentenced to death. At the time of our visit they were awaiting the arrival from Malolos of the ratification of their sentence by the president.

Everywhere we traveled the greatest loyalty toward Aguinaldo was expressed. Now, at the time of his reverses, it is possible, though I am far from convinced, that he represents but one element of his people; then, in his prosperity, he certainly represented them all—at least in northern Luzon. At that time the enthusiasm of the people was tuned to the highest pitch. In every village every man was training in arms. Companies were formed of boys from 8 years of age upward. Wooden guns were furnished them, and they were drilled systematically every day. The women also were imbued with the spirit. Many and many a time have the people of a village gathered in the large room of the "presidencia," where the paymaster and I were quartered, and put their whole hearts into the songs in which their patriotism found vent. Of these songs the national hymn was the favorite, and no one within hearing ever failed to join in the chorus:

Del sueño de tres Siglos
Hermanos despertad!
Gritando, "Fuera España!
Viva la libertad!"

(From your sleep of three centuries,
Brothers awake!
Crying, "Away with Spain!
Live liberty!")

THE MILITARY FILIPINO.

[By Leonard R. Sargent.]

The provisional government which assumed control of Filipino affairs in Luzon Island after the downfall of the Spanish power was a military one. The president of the so-called republic was general of the army and had at his command all the forces of the state, while military officers filled the high positions throughout the provinces. It was continually asserted by those in power that this disposition of the control of affairs had been resorted to merely to tide over the existing emergency and that it should continue only until the establishment of a permanent peace. As long as it remained in force, however, the concentration of power was absolute, and, moreover, no change of government could be contemplated without the cooperation of the controlling class. In the event of peace the population hoped to see the reins of government placed in their hands, but if opposition were offered, they certainly had not the power to seize them. The military class controlled the situation, and with it, in great measure, the destiny of the people. Accordingly as they were actuated by motives of patriotism or of personal ambition they could, if unmolested, inaugurate a just and liberal government or they could set upon the galled shoulders of their race a yoke as cruel as that they had just cast off.

It will never be known how they would have stood this crucial test. The peace they had anticipated is further from them now than ever, and it has been decreed that a stronger power should relieve them of the responsibility of the vital decision. Yet they have not been deprived of importance. They still retain the official voice of their people, and it is with them that our nation is now at war. In view of their preeminent position in Luzon affairs, past, present, and future, some interest must attach to every observation of their character, especially to such as tend to show to what extent they represent the feelings and aspirations of the great mass of the Filipino population, and in what measure they have at heart the truest interests of their race.

The leaders of the military element have been drawn, almost without exception, from the younger generation of that enlightened class of Filipinos of which I have spoken in a previous article as existing everywhere throughout Luzon Island. They possess, of course, many qualities in common with their older kinsfolk, in whose charge they have been reared; and yet they differ from them so significantly on many points as to deserve particular attention. The characters of men are not set to such rigid lines as to remain unchanged by the sudden attainment of authority, and the Filipino, like his brother of every other land, assumes a new demeanor with his uniform of office

THE BACKWOODS FILIPINO.

[By Leonard R. Sargent.]

It has been my privilege to be intimately associated with the Filipino people for a short time at a most interesting period of their history. With the permission of Admiral Dewey I spent the greater part of the months of October and November of 1898, in company with Paymaster W. B. Wilcox, United States Navy, in the interior of the northern part of the island of Luzon. It will be remembered that at that date the United States had not yet announced its policy with regard to the Philippines. The terms of the treaty with Spain were being negotiated by our commissioners at Paris, and the fate of the islands hung in the balance. In the meantime the native population, taking matters into their own hands, had declared their independence from all foreign jurisdiction and had set up a provisional government, with Aguinaldo at its head.

Although this government has never been recognized, and in all probability will go out of existence without recognition, yet it can not be denied that in a region occupied by many millions of inhabitants for nearly six months it stood alone between anarchy and order. The military forces of the United States held control only in Manila, with its environs, and in Cavite, and had no authority to proceed further; while in the vast remaining districts the representatives of the only other recognized power on the field were prisoners in the hands of their despised subjects. It was the opinion at Manila during this anomalous period in our Philippine relations, and possibly in the United States as well, that such a state of affairs must breed something akin to anarchy.

I can state unreservedly, however, that Mr. Wilcox and I found the existing conditions to be much at variance with this opinion. During our absence from Manila we traveled more than 600 miles in a very comprehensive circuit through the northern part of the island of Luzon, traversing a characteristic and important district. In this way we visited seven provinces, of which some were under the immediate control of the central government at Malolos, while others were remotely situated, separated from each other and from the seat of government by natural divisions of land, and accessible only by lengthy and arduous travel. As a tribute to the efficiency of Aguinaldo's government and to the law-abiding character of his subjects, I offer the fact that Mr. Wilcox and I pursued our journey throughout in perfect security, and returned to Manila with only the most pleasing recollections of the quiet and orderly life which we found the natives to be leading under the new régime.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, it occurs to me that the infinite pains taken to show that the Filipinos are not American citizens are due to the fact that if we can hold them outside, beyond the pale of the Constitution, then we can protect certain home industries against the competition of the products of those islands. That appears to me to be one cause, if not a very great cause. It has been alleged that this war was undertaken for commercial greed. I do not believe it. I would be loath to believe, Mr. President, that there was any man or that there were any set of men in the United States so utterly depraved, so lost to every sentiment of honor and patriotism and humanity, as to undertake a war of this character, so disastrous and so destructive, for the mere purpose of commercial greed.

I believe that after the war with Spain was declared certain parties took advantage of the situation in order to exploit our acquisitions for their personal benefit, but I do not believe that the President of the United States or his advisers ever contemplated or projected a war of this kind in order that certain men might derive benefit and advantage. That to me is so appalling, that to me shows such utter depravity and inhumanity as to be incredible.

Now, sir, if these people are citizens of the United States and are, as the Senator from Indiana stated and as the report of the Schurman commission states, utterly incapable of self-government, what are we going to do with them? Are we going to tolerate for all time a rule beyond the Constitution, deriving its source and power only from the Congress of the United States? Is not that abhorrent to the doctrine laid down by the distinguished men of the past, the dead statesmen of bygone years? Does not this distinguished man from Massachusetts, Mr. Sumner, say that the will and consent of the people must be had first before we can take them into constitutional wedlock? Can the Constitution of the United States embrace in its holy arms such people as reside in the Philippine Islands? Can we take head-hunters, polygamists, savages, slaveholders, who for all time will be incapable of our government, and make them citizens of the United States? They are citizens if we take them; and if they are incapable of ever coming up to the forms of our Government, the very best of statesmanship, the very best of humanity, the very best of regard for our own interests and our own institutions require us to get rid of them.

I am willing to get rid of them at any moment. I do not want some accomplished gentleman from Ohio, or from any other State, I will say to my friend the senior Senator from Ohio, to be sent over there as the proconsular agent of Congress, appointed by the Executive, to govern the head-hunters and the polygamists and the slave owners of that country. I do not want them to be American citizens, as I think they must be if we take over that territory; and therefore it is that I do not want them, and I do not think the American people want them. I believe that this question ought to be agitated from now on. I believe that when the intelligence of the American people is thoroughly awakened and their consciences quickened on this matter we will drop the Philippine Islands, after having restored the status quo as near as may be and after having pacified the people and aided them to establish stable government.

Certain responsibilities rest upon us, and greater responsibilities rest upon us after this war, this terrible war of blood and havoc and destruction. We must see to it that that people are reestablished in some kind of a government. We must see to it that peace reigns there, and the first signal of peaceful greeting sent from this Congress to that people will be the signal of their laying down their arms. You can not reestablish a people on a peace basis when you pursue the bloody methods of war. It is an utter impossibility. You can not do it. It is not in human nature; and if these people are such as they are described to be, mixed races descended from the Spaniard and Malay, revenge is deeply embedded in their nature. A Spaniard is the most noted man in all the world for guerrilla warfare, and the Malays have been distinguished for ages for the quality of sullen revenge.

Mr. President, I have occupied as much of the time of the Senate as I desire upon this question. I have not gone into these facts with that industry and systematic care which they deserve, as much for the reason that they have been gone over thoroughly and analyzed completely and exhaustively by others as that my time has been occupied in other directions to such an extent that I was not prepared to do so. The main facts, however, I think I have grouped. The main facts bearing upon this situation authorized us before active hostilities commenced to have treated with those people as an independent people. They had more muniments of independence than the Cubans, and we declared that the Cubans are, and ought to be, a free and independent people, and we are estopped to deny, from the facts in Document 62, that the same declaration could not and should not have been made in regard to the Filipinos. Our ways ought to be ways of peace in dealing with these people. Our Constitution does not, in my opinion, recognize any war whatever of aggression. "Forcible annexation," in the language of President McKinley, "is criminal aggression." It was true then and it is true now, and I would to God he had followed a course indicated by the expression of that noble sentiment. If forcible annexation is not what we are attempting in regard to the Filipinos, it is difficult to say what it is. They, with arms in their hands, resent our attempt to impose our Government upon them. With only one further remark I will close.

The idea seems to prevail in the minds not only of Senators and Members of the other House, but largely throughout the United States, that as our Government is the best Government in the world, any people who reject that Government when we seek to impose it on them by force must be subjected to our military and civil tyranny. No people in the world, however good your Government, desire to take it at the point of the bayonet. Every people are entitled to their own government, whatever it may be. Our propaganda is a peaceful one. Our institutions, if more excellent than those of other nations, will silently but surely find lodgment in other lands. It will be triumph sufficient when our Republic will by peaceful methods give laws and constitutions to mankind. War and blood, fire and sword, will not do it.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH.

Mr. RAWLINS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2198) increasing the limit of the cost of the public building at Salt Lake City, Utah.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, in line 6, before the word "thousand," to strike out "seven hundred and fifty" and insert "five hundred;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the limit of the cost of the public building to be erected at Salt Lake City, in the State of Utah, is hereby changed from $[illegible] to $500,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RIGHT OF SUFFRAGE IN NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask that the resolution offered by my colleague [Mr. PRITCHARD] may be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHILTON in the chair). The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution indicated by the Senator from North Carolina, which will be read.

The resolution submitted by Mr. PRITCHARD January 8, 1900, was read, as follows:

Resolved, That an enactment, by constitution or otherwise, by any State which confers the right to vote upon any of its citizens because of their descent from certain persons or classes of persons, and excludes other citizens because they are not descended from such persons or classes of persons, having all other qualifications prescribed by law, in the opinion of the Senate, is in violation of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States and of a fundamental principle of our republican form of government.

Mr. BUTLER addressed the Senate. After having spoken for twenty-five minutes,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina will suspend for one moment while the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. PRITCHARD. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside in order that the Senator from North Carolina may proceed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside in order that his colleague may conclude his speech. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the junior Senator from North Carolina will proceed.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I have listened attentively to the three speeches which have been delivered in the Senate in opposition to this resolution. I have been surprised that these Senators have devoted the major part of their speeches not to the legal and constitutional questions at issue, but, instead, to a discussion of a question that is not at issue and about which there is no contention—that is, whether or not the negro is as intelligent and as capable of self-government as the white man. If the proposition before the Senate were a resolution for the repeal of the fifteenth amendment, then their speeches would have been more to the point. But that is not the question raised by the resolution, nor is it the question that confronts the people of North Carolina to be voted on at the August election of this year, nor is it the question that the courts would consider.

The fifteenth amendment, whether its adoption was wise or unwise, is a part of the organic law of this Republic, and is as binding as any other section of the Federal Constitution; and while it so remains it should and must be respected and obeyed, not only by every State, but by every citizen and voter; and further, it is well known that the highest court of the land, regardless of what the private opinions of the individual judges might be as to the wisdom of the fifteenth amendment or any other provision of the Constitution, must and will declare null and void any and every enactment of any State legislature or any State constitutional amendment that violates that or any other provision of the Federal Constitution.

THE ONLY QUESTION AT ISSUE.

The resolution now before the Senate, offered by my colleague, raises this question as to two States of the Union. The State of Louisiana has already adopted an amendment to its State constitution the open and declared purpose of which was to evade the fifteenth amendment to the United States Constitution. The legislature of the State that I have the honor in part to represent has submitted a similar amendment to the people of that State, to be voted on next August. Now, I submit that the only question at issue which will or can be considered by the Senate in passing upon the proposed resolution is whether or not the Louisiana amendment and the proposed North Carolina amendment are in violation of the Federal Constitution. The opinion of the Senate on this legal question will determine whether it will pass or reject the pending resolution, and the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States on this same legal question, when it comes before it, will determine whether such an amendment shall stand or fall. I may add also that it will be this legal question that will largely determine whether or not the voters of North Carolina will next August adopt the proposed amendment at the polls. I say this, for I feel that I can say on behalf of the voters of North Carolina, regardless of party, that they will not knowingly and willfully vote for a measure that is in violation of any provision of the Federal Constitution, even though in their judgment such provision was not wise. I know myself personally many voters who believe that the adoption of the fifteenth amendment was not only unwise, but a great mistake and a grievous error, yet who will vote against the proposed amendment because they are satisfied that it is clearly in conflict with our National Constitution.

The people of North Carolina are law-abiding. They believe in dealing in a frank, honest, and candid manner with public questions as well as with private ones. I believe that a majority of the voters of that State would to-morrow, if the question were before them, vote to repeal or amend the fifteenth amendment. But I say it to their honor and to their credit that they have too much respect for their oaths as citizens and too much regard for every law while it remains law to vote for a proposition in violation of the fifteenth amendment as long as that amendment stands.

Therefore, the only questions at issue before the Senate and before the voters of North Carolina are the legal ones which would be considered by the Supreme Court if the proposed suffrage amendment should come before it to be tested. What are these legal questions?

First. Is section 5 of the proposed amendment unconstitutional—in conflict with the fifteenth amendment?

Second. If the Supreme Court should hold that section 5 is unconstitutional, would it also hold that the balance of the amendment (which makes a complete and constitutional scheme of limiting suffrage) should stand as a part of the organic law of the State?

These are the questions I propose to discuss. If the law and the decisions of our Supreme Court show that the answers to both of these questions must be in the affirmative, I take it that then there would not be a man in this body nor a voter in North Carolina who would dare support the proposed amendment.

WHAT ARE THE FACTS AND WHAT IS THE LAW?

Then let us see what the facts are and what the law is. The proposed amendment, with the exception of section 5, is admitted by everyone to be clearly constitutional. The educational qualification section, which is section 4, is as follows:

SEC. 4. Every person presenting himself for registration shall be able to read and write any section of the Constitution in the English language; and before he shall be entitled to vote he shall have paid, on or before the 1st day of March of the year in which he proposes to vote, his poll tax, as prescribed by law, for the previous year. Poll taxes shall be a lien only on assessed property, and no process shall issue to enforce the collection of the same except against assessed property.

Now, is this section limiting suffrage to those who can meet the educational test to read and write constitutional? Clearly so, because the States have full power to limit and regulate suffrage, except as inhibited by the fifteenth amendment of the Federal Constitution. That amendment is as follows:

The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

The Supreme Court in a number of cases, passing upon this question and construing the fifteenth amendment, has definitely laid down this principle: A suffrage qualification, to be in accordance with the fifteenth amendment, must operate equally, impartially, and uniformly upon both races and upon those formerly free or formerly bond. Thus we see that the fourth section, limiting suffrage to those who can read and write, operates uniformly upon both races, and upon those formerly free or formerly bond, and therefore is clearly not in violation of the fifteenth amendment, but comes directly within the rule laid down by the court. If the proposed suffrage amendment in North Carolina had stopped here, there could have been no question as to its constitutionality.

But there is another section which, by an arbitrary provision, pretends to attempt to create a special privileged ancestral class and to exempt them from the operation of section 4. It is as follows:

SEC. 5. No male person who was on January 1, 1867, or at any time prior thereto, entitled to vote under the laws of any State in the United States wherein he then resided, and no lineal descendant of any such person, shall be denied the right to register and vote at any election in this State by reason of his failure to possess the educational qualifications prescribed in section 4 of this article: Provided, He shall have registered in accordance with the terms of this section prior to December 1, 1908.

The general assembly shall provide for a permanent record of all persons who register under this section on or before November 1, 1908, and all such persons shall be entitled to register and vote at all elections by the people in this State, unless disqualified under section 2 of this article: Provided, Such persons shall have paid their poll tax as required by law.

Now, the question is this: Is this section (known as the "grandfather clause") constitutional? It provides that a citizen who could vote on or before January 1, 1867, or whose fathers or grandfathers were then allowed to vote, shall be exempt from the provisions of section 4 and permitted to vote, even though unable to read and write, and therefore not possessing the qualifications required of other voters. Now, does this provision operate equally, impartially, and uniformly upon both races and upon those formerly free or formerly bond? If it does not, as the Supreme Court says it must to be constitutional, then clearly it is unconstitutional and must fall.

THE SUPREME COURT RULES OF CONSTRUCTION.

The advocates of this proposed amendment boast that its purpose is to disfranchise all illiterate blacks while not disfranchising a single illiterate white man. Yet they claim that they have so covered up their purpose in the wording of section 5 that the Supreme Court of the United States will be unable, from its form, to detect its purpose and effect. Let us see if this is true. We can best determine what rule of construction and interpretation the court would follow in considering such a provision as the proposed amendment by referring to the decisions of the Supreme Court in similar cases. These decisions (some of which I will cite in a few moments) show that in considering questions like the proposed amendment the court would consider, first, the political history of the times that called forth the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States and section 5 of the proposed amendment in North Carolina, and next the court would consider the effect of section 5 of the proposed amendment and see if its natural and reasonable effect would be to destroy the guaranty against discrimination in the fifteenth amendment. I take it that no lawyer familiar with the decisions of our Supreme Court will question that this is a fair and correct statement of the rule of construction and interpretation by which the court has in the past been guided and would, of course, be guided in this and all similar cases.

AUTHORITIES CITED.

I cite the opinion of the court, rendered by Chief Justice Marshall in the case of Brown vs. Maryland (12 Wheaton), in support of my statement as to the rules of construction that the court adopts in such cases.

Also the opinion of the court in the Dred Scott case, rendered by Chief Justice Taney, and, in addition, every concurring and dissenting opinion in that case bear out this rule of construction.

In discussing the constitutionality of Article IV, section 3, subsection 2, of the Constitution, the court in the latter case said:

> A brief summary of the history of the times, as well as the careful and measured terms in which the article is framed, well shows the correctness of the proposition.

In Bank vs. Fenno (8 Wallace) Chief Justice Chase, in discussing the meaning of the term "direct tax," said:

> We are obliged, therefore, to resort to historical evidence and to seek the meaning of the words in the use and in the opinion of those whose relation to the Government and means of knowledge warranted them in speaking with authority.

I cite, in addition, the opinion of the court, rendered by Chief Justice Fuller, in the recent income-tax case, as well as the dissenting opinions, all of which went into long historical dissertations.

In the case of Hahns vs. Louisiana Judge Bradley reviews fully the history that surrounds the enactment of the eleventh amendment to the Constitution.

Chief Justice Cooley, the author of Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, in People vs. Harding (53 Michigan), says:

> In seeking for the real meaning of the Constitution we must take into consideration the times and the circumstances under which it was framed, the general spirit of the times, and the prevailing sentiment among the people. Every constitution has a history of its own, which is likely to be more or less peculiar, and unless interpreted in the light of this history is liable to express purposes which were never in the minds of the people when agreeing to it. This the court must keep in mind when called upon to interpret.

Many more decisions to the same effect can be cited, and none to the contrary, as far as I have been able to find, to support the rule of construction and interpretation to the effect that the court would consider the political history of the times, etc., in determining the object of section 5 of the amendment.

As to the second rule of construction, that the court will look to the effect of section 5 when passing upon its constitutionality, the authorities are equally as abundant and conclusive.

In Parke vs. Press Company Judge Campbell, one of Michigan's greatest judges, rendering the opinion of the court, said:

> But we do not think the State controls the action or is within the power of constitutional legislation. This will, in our judgment, appear from a statement of its effect if carried out.

Again, in Soon Hing vs. Crowley (113 U. S. Reports, page 703), the court says:

> And the rule is general with reference to the enactments of all legislative bodies, that the courts can not inquire into the motives of the legislators in passing them, except as they may be disclosed on the face of the acts, or inferrible from their operation, considered with reference to the condition of the country and existing legislation. The motives of the legislators considered as the purposes they had in view will always be presumed to be to accomplish that which follows as the natural and reasonable effect of their enactments.

Is it possible for anything to be clearer or more to the point and conclusive than this opinion of the court?

Again, in Minnesota vs. Barber (136 U. S. Reports, page 313), the court says:

> In whatever language a statute may be framed, its purpose must be determined by its natural and reasonable effect.

The United States Supreme Court has universally followed the same rule of construction. I will stop to quote from but one more case.

In Henderson vs. The Mayor (92 U. S. Reports) the court, using almost the same language I have quoted above, said:

> In whatever language a statute might be framed, its purpose must be determined by its natural and reasonable effect.

So I take it that everyone will admit that should section 5 of this proposed amendment come before the court, that the court would, of course, consider the history that surrounds and is so mingled with the fifteenth amendment and section 5, and would also consider "the natural and reasonable effect" of that section.

I repeat, Mr. President, that I do not think there is a lawyer in this body or in the country that will question that statement. Now, if that is true, and it is true beyond question, then what follows?

SECTION 5 CLEARLY UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

The court, following these well-established rules of construction, would necessarily discover that section 5 was plainly obnoxious to the fifteenth amendment. The court would first inquire, Why was the arbitrary date of 1867 adopted? Why not 1875 or 1880 or 1899? The court would necessarily have to inquire what class of citizens could vote in 1867 or prior thereto and what class could not; whose grandfathers could vote then and whose grandfathers could not. The answer to this question would bring sharply to the attention of the court the fact that all of that class of citizens who were in servitude, and who, therefore, could not vote in 1867, are discriminated against by being excluded from the special privilege attempted to be conferred by section 5 upon the class that was not in servitude in 1867.

Mr. President, can there be any shadow of a doubt as to what the decision of the court would be when it thus had plainly before it the fact that the purpose and necessary effect of section 5 is to establish an educational qualification for every former slave or descendant of a slave while expressly removing this educational qualification from practically all others? It was to prevent this very thing from being done that the fifteenth amendment was adopted. If section 5 of this proposed amendment is not in violation of the fifteenth amendment to the United States Constitution, then it seems to me that it would be impossible to violate that amendment. Section 5, as worded, is just as unconstitutional as if it were worded as follows:

> Every male person who was a slave or who is the descendant of a slave shall not be allowed to vote unless he can read and write, but all male persons who could vote in 1867 or whose fathers or grandfathers could vote then shall not be required to submit to any educational test.

Is there anyone who would contend that this language would be constitutional? Certainly not. But how does this language differ from section 5? In form only; the purpose of effect of both are the same. When this same amendment was before the Louisiana convention, Judge Coco opposed section 5 because, he declared, it was clearly unconstitutional. He argued that, inasmuch as in 1867 only whites could vote, the fifth section, as far as its constitutionality was concerned, might as well read:

> No person shall be denied the right to vote who on January 1, 1868, or any date prior thereto, was a white citizen of the State of Louisiana.

Continuing, he said:

> To my mind the section presents a weak and transparent subterfuge, an unmanly evasion of the Constitution of the United States, and on that ground alone I could not give it my support.

This extract of the judge's speech is taken from an article in the Harvard Law Review of December, 1899, in which Mr. Eaton ably reviews the proceedings of the Louisiana constitutional convention.

Mr. President, it is so well settled that the constitutionality of a law is to be determined not by its form, but by the effect of its operation that this principle has become an established axiom of constitutional law. Hence the legal maxim: "Nothing can be done indirectly which can not be done directly." I do not deem it necessary to burden the Senate with further citations on this point, for there is not a case in the United States Reports that is not an authority to support this position.

Then how can the court escape the inevitable conclusion that section 5 is unconstitutional? Indeed, unless the court should reverse all former decisions it must so hold. Nothing can be clearer; nothing can be more certain.

Mr. President, this completes my argument as to the unconstitutionality of section 5, and I would proceed at once to discuss the other question, as to whether the amendment would fall as a whole or only section 5 would fall, were it not for the speeches made by Senators on the other side of this question.

There have been three of these speeches, and I desire to call attention briefly to each of them before proceeding to discuss the legal phases of the other important question.

While I think I can say truthfully that not an argument or a citation made by any of them controverts my position, yet I will refer briefly to the few cases which they cited and which they claim as authority to the contrary.

REPLY TO SENATOR M'ENERY.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. MCENERY] based his whole contention, as I understood him, upon the claim that section 5 did not discriminate against former slaves because it did not exclude them from suffrage; but, on the other hand, included another class who had not been in servitude. His contention, if I understood him, was that section 4, limiting suffrage to an educational qualification and applying it to all races alike, was, of course, constitutional (which everybody admits), but that when section 5 comes along and confers a still wider suffrage on a certain class none of whom were slaves, that this inclusion, not being exclusion, is not in violation of the fifteenth amendment. I have heard one or two other persons make the same argument; not in this body, however. Mr. President, with all due respect to the Senator, candor forces me to say that a thinner and more transparent subterfuge, a weaker and more untenable argument, was never advanced by any lawyer in the court-house, even with the most desperate case to defend. I take it that the distinguished Senator would not have the courage to seriously make that argument before the Supreme Court of the United States.

But the Senator cites an authority which he claims supports that position. It is as follows: McPherson vs. Blackner (110 U. S., page 1). He quotes the following:

> The right to vote intended to be protected refers to the right to vote as established by the laws and constitution of the State. There is no color for the contention that, under the amendment, every male inhabitant of the State, being a citizen of the United States, has, from the time of his majority, a right to vote for Presidential electors.

He quotes next from The State vs. Cruikshank et al. (92 U. S. Reports, page 542), as follows:

> From this it appears that the right of suffrage is not a necessary attribute of national citizenship; but that exemption from discrimination in the exercise of that right on account of race, etc., is; but it must be expressly averred.

The only point that I could see that he attempted to make by this citation was that he repeated the words "expressly averred."

But, Mr. President, the Senator's own authority contains sufficient language with which to answer his contention. Is not the inclusion of a class into certain privileges which are denied to another class as much a discrimination as the direct exclusion of the said class? When there is a discrimination in favor of one class there is necessarily at the same time a discrimination against another class; and is not this discrimination "expressly averred" in section 5? The authority he cites is an authority against his contention.

Of course the Federal Government does not confer the right to vote on anyone. The States confer that right; but the fifteenth amendment says that when a State proceeds to confer that right upon its citizens it shall not abridge the suffrage rights of those who have been in slavery. Abridgment there can mean but one thing, and that is that the States shall not confer less suffrage privileges upon the class of former slaves than upon its other citizens. But if there was any doubt about this question, the Supreme Court, in one terse sentence, interpreting the fifteenth amendment, in the case of The United States vs. Reese, has settled it. That sentence is as follows:

> If citizens of one race having certain qualifications are permitted by law to vote, those of another having the same qualifications must be.

Thus we see that it makes no difference whether the discrimination is by restricting directly the suffrage privileges of the former slave or indirectly by enlarging the privileges of another class while denying those privileges to the former slave; yet it is an abridgment within the meaning of the fifteenth amendment. Can anything be clearer?

If that does not put beyond all question the unconstitutionality of section 5, then nothing can (for those who still doubt) except to have the court to call the section by name and apply the above words to it.

But, Mr. President, I do not consider it necessary to analyze the argument of the Senator from Louisiana, even if it were stronger than it is, because the Senate will remember that while the Senator was delivering his speech I interrupted him and read the following letter from the New Orleans Times-Democrat of Friday, March 18, 1898, in which the Senator strongly expressed the same view that I now hold. The letter is as follows:

> WASHINGTON, D. C., March 17, 1898.
> To the Times-Democrat:
> In answer, I say that section 5 is grossly unconstitutional. I have submitted the same to some of the ablest Democrats of the Senate, who are able constitutional lawyers. They all concur in my opinion, that if adopted, the effect will be to lose our representation in Congress and in the electoral vote of the State.

The Senate will remember that when I asked the Senator if he did not write that letter and if he was not then of the opinion that the amendment was "grossly unconstitutional" he replied:

> Yes, sir; when the constitutional convention was in session I was telegraphed to know what was my opinion of this section 5. I replied to that telegram that in my opinion it was unconstitutional. I then received another telegram, after its adoption, to know if, when it was attacked, I would defend it in the Senate of the United States. To that telegram I replied that I would.

So, Mr. President, I take it that the Senator's speech was simply delivered in response to that pledge to attempt to defend the "grossly unconstitutional" thing if his State should unwisely adopt it.

REPLY TO SENATOR MONEY.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY], if I remember correctly, cited only one authority in support of his contention that section 5 is constitutional, and that was the Mississippi case, in which the Supreme Court sustained the constitutionality of the Mississippi suffrage amendment; but the decision of the court in that case is not in the least in point, but applies to an entirely different constitutional provision. What does the suffrage provision of the Mississippi constitution provide?

I happen not to have an official copy of the constitution of Mississippi, and this extract is taken from a magazine article, but presume it is correct.

It provides that—

> On and after January 1, 1892, every elector shall, in addition to the foregoing qualifications, be able to read and write any section of the constitution of this State, or he shall be able to understand the same when read to him, or to give a reasonable interpretation thereof.

This provision, as is readily seen, creates no privileged class. It does not confer the right to vote upon one class and deny it to another, but it provides an educational qualification which applies to all classes alike. It is similar to section 4 of the proposed amendment in North Carolina, which everybody admits is constitutional. To make the Mississippi suffrage provision like the North Carolina amendment it would be necessary to add another section following the section I have just read, which would exempt a class—that is, those who voted or whose fathers and grandfathers voted in 1867 or before—from the provisions of the Mississippi constitution. But the Mississippi constitution contains no such provision. The court, in passing upon the suffrage provision of the Mississippi constitution, stated that it was clearly constitutional unless the State court should so construe that provision or unless its provisions should be administered in a way to violate the fifteenth amendment by denying the former slaves and their descendants the right to vote as conferred upon other citizens. In short, as the court said in Williams vs. Mississippi, in passing upon the same provision, there was nothing unconstitutional in the terms of the Mississippi suffrage provision nor was there anything unconstitutional in its legal effect. The court did say, however, that it might be construed so as to make it unconstitutional and that it might be administered "with an evil eye and an unequal hand" so as to make it unconstitutional, but the court went on further to say that the case as it was presented to the court did not show that either had been done; therefore the court upheld its constitutionality.

But how different with the proposed amendment in North Carolina, where the Mississippi educational provision is qualified by section 5. In this case the unconstitutionality of the "grandfather" section is apparent from its terms when interpreted according to the rules I have before referred to—that is, in the light of the history of the times and in view of the immediate and necessary effect. So the Mississippi cases, instead of being authority to support section 5, are strong and direct authority the other way. Mr. President, section 5 of the proposed amendment can not be so construed or interpreted as to make it constitutional. It can not be administered so as to make it constitutional. It is unconstitutional as its stands on its face and by its necessary effect, by every rule of construction that the court has ever followed.

REPLY TO SENATOR MORGAN.

When the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] delivered his speech on this question, I sat near him and paid the closest attention. On account of his reputation as a constitutional lawyer I was very anxious to hear him and curious to know what kind of argument he could advance or what hitherto-undiscovered opinion of the Supreme Court he could adduce to maintain the constitutionality of such a thinly veiled subterfuge as section 5. But for once I was doomed to disappointment when listening to the Senator from Alabama. He did not attempt seriously to discuss and argue the constitutionality of section 5. Clearly he is too wise and too good a lawyer to put himself on record with argument that would not bear the test of analysis and comparison with decided cases.

So he contented himself with expressing an opinion that the Mississippi cases applied to section 5 and then devoting all of the remainder of his speech to a discussion of the dangers of reconstruction and using high-sounding phrases about the magnitude of the difference between the Anglo-Saxon and the African. The same is true in this respect of the speeches of the other two Senators. What legal argument they essayed to put forth seems to indicate that they are influenced more by their desires and hopes than by their judgment. Their speeches would no doubt be fitting in a campaign where "nigger" was to be the slogan and race prejudice must be aroused in order to prevent the calm and deliberate consideration of argument and to banish reason and enthrone in its stead passion and prejudice; and, whether so intended or not, this will be the chief use to which their speeches will be put in the coming campaign in North Carolina. But I submit that such a discussion of the difference between the Anglo-Saxon and the African does not seem fitting in the United States Senate when a great legal and constitutional question is under consideration, and, surely, their authors could not expect such speeches to be listened to with much patience should they attempt to deliver them before the greatest and ablest court in the world while this constitutional question was being considered for adjudication.

WHAT THE LAW JOURNALS AND GREAT CONSTITUTIONAL LAWYERS SAY.

Mr. President, the adoption of this novel scheme of attempting to evade the fifteenth amendment in Louisiana and the proposed attempt in North Carolina has attracted a great deal of attention from the legal profession and the law journals. I have on my desk the Harvard Law Review of December, 1899, which contains an able and thoughtful article by Amasa M. Eaton on this question, to which I have already referred. After reviewing the whole question at length from a legal standpoint, he contends that the court must necessarily declare section 5 unconstitutional. He himself expresses doubt as to the wisdom of the adoption of the fifteenth amendment, but calls attention to the fact that this has nothing whatever to do with the constitutionality of the proposed suffrage amendment.

A number of other law journals have discussed it, and so far as I have seen not a single one has attempted to uphold its constitutionality. I have a copy of the current number of the Law Notes, with a comment upon the speech delivered by my colleague, in which the editor takes the same position. The editor also cites the opinion of Mr. William D. Guthrie, of the New York bar, as a good constitutional authority.

Mr. Guthrie was one of the distinguished lawyers associated with Mr. Choate in arguing the income-tax cases before the Supreme Court, and is recognized as one of the ablest constitutional lawyers in the United States. In his law lectures on the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments, he refers to and discusses the constitutional amendment of Louisiana, and the proposed one in North Carolina is like it. He declares, commenting upon section 5, the "grandfather clause," that it is a "travesty of constitutional justice." I do not put my hand just now on the extract from Mr. Guthrie's lectures, in which he declared that the proposed constitutional amendment is a travesty of constitutional justice, but I will ask permission to put it in my remarks.

The matter referred to is as follows:

> This travesty of constitutional justice ought to be brought to the test in the Federal courts at the earliest possible moment. If such a provision can be sustained as within the power of the States to regulate the qualification of voters, the result ought to be the diminution of Louisiana's representation in Congress and in the electoral college in proportion to the excluded negro vote.

Ex-Senator Edmunds, who is recognized as one of the greatest, if not the greatest, living constitutional lawyers, has declared section 5 of the Louisiana amendment unconstitutional, and he is also of the opinion that section 5 would fall and that the remainder of the amendment would stand. But I will discuss that feature of the question in a few minutes.

In this connection I also call attention to the recent action of the Georgia legislature in voting down a similar amendment by the overwhelming majority of 137 to 3. In the debate the members of the legislature took the position that section 5 was not only unconstitutional, but that it was an unmanly subterfuge, was unjust, and was not necessary. I have condensed the debate on this question before the Georgia legislature, as published in the Atlanta papers, and will ask permission to put it into the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

I ask permission to put the extracts from that debate in my remarks because I think the Senate and the country ought to see the argument, the legal opinions, and the doubts expressed that influenced the Georgia legislature in repudiating this dangerous, uncandid, and unmanly scheme.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT DISCUSSED BY GEORGIA LEGISLATURE.

The Atlanta (Ga.) Constitution of November 29, 1899, giving a report of the legislative proceedings, said:

> "The only voice raised in defense of the measure was that of its author, who made an able, though ineffective, argument, while half a dozen leading members of the house took the floor in protest against the passage of the bill, which they pronounced an open and admitted discrimination against one class of citizens in the State. After the previous question had been called, shutting off debate on the issue, an effort was made to lay the bill on the table, partly out of deference to its author and in view of the stubborn opposition with which it met, as well as the certainty that it would meet defeat if put on its passage. The main line of opposition to the Hardwick bill brought out in the debate was against the grandfather clause.
>
> "Mr. Copeland, of Walker, addressed the Chair. He said: 'If I properly understand this measure, it is radical, unjust, and unfair. I am in favor of no amendment to the constitution or change in the law that does not meet with the approval of the qualified voters of the State, and I am satisfied that the people of Georgia would not and never have given their approval to so radical a change as this. No one appreciates more than I the deplorable condition of the ballot in our State to day, but I submit that this measure is not the proper one to work the change so much needed. I wish to remind the house that for everyone who sells his vote there is one who buys it, and the wrong in one case is as great as in the other.' Mr. Copeland proceeded to make an able presentation of the reasons against the passage of the measure, and was once interrupted by loud applause.
> "Mr. Harrison, of Quitman, declared the proposed measure harsher in every respect than any reform bill ever enacted into law in any of the Southern States except Louisiana. He said: 'In Mississippi some educational qualification is imposed by recent enactment, but the qualification is nothing compared to the harshness of this measure. The objection I raise to the bill here and the objection with which I fought the measure in the committee room is that it is legislating purposely, positively, and conclusively against one race; purposely, positively, and conclusively in favor of another race. Is it judicious to work this change in the law? I speak from an experience of fifty years as a citizen, in which time I have had occasion to observe the prevailing condition in my State, and I tell you that the provisions are first of all unnecessary.'
>
> "Mr. Howard, of Challapoochee, opposed the bill. He said: 'In my section of the State the negro who has never spent one day in school is the best citizen of his class and the most intelligent voter of his race. It has been my observation that education is not a test of citizenship. We are hedged in by the Federal Constitution, which prohibits us from barring any man from citizenship by reason of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, and I can not see how the bill before the house can be considered in any light but as a violation of the provisions of that Constitution. If we are to limit the franchise, it is a limit that should work alike in both races.'
>
> "Mr. Overstreet, of Screven, began with a statement that he would feel that he was doing the people of his section and State an injustice and falling far short of his duty to his constituents if he did not raise his voice in opposition to the pending measure. He said: 'From the time when the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution was enacted up to the present day the best part of the negro race in Georgia has voted and stood by the party to which I have the honor to belong. I would take pleasure in going on record as favoring the elimination of the ignorant and purchasable voter of all classes of this State, but I am not in favor of the discrimination which is proposed in this bill.'
>
> "On the call of the ayes and nays, which were demanded, only three members, Mr. Hardwick of Washington, Mr. Bell of Forsyth, and Mr. Ellis of Bibb, voted for the bill.
>
> "Mr. Hall, of Bibb, was against the bill, because it might be the means, he claimed, of interfering with the white voter.
>
> "In voting against the Hardwick bill Mr. Holder, of Jackson, had the following to say: 'I oppose the bill because I believe it to be in violation of the Constitution of the Republic. But were it constitutional, it is not right to deprive any man of his ballot on account of his color. I believe in every man in this State being allowed to vote regardless of his color, so long as he complies with the requirements of the State in paying taxes, working roads, responding to his country's call to go to arms when his service is needed, and as long as he is obedient to law. I oppose the measure because it will also disfranchise hundreds of honest white men who can not read and write and give a reasonable interpretation of the Constitution. I oppose it because it is unnecessary.'"

I also insert some extracts from the debates in the Louisiana convention:

DEMOCRATS IN LOUISIANA CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION DENOUNCED THE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT AS VICIOUS AND UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

In the New Orleans Times-Democrat of March 28, 1898, the views of the Democratic members of the constitutional convention in opposition to the amendment are given as follows:

Mr. Clingman said: "I am opposed to section 5. I favor an educational or property qualification, with a poll tax, to take effect at the adoption of this constitution."

Mr. Chiapella said: "I believe that section 5 is violative of the amendments of the Federal Constitution, and I fear that the adoption of this unconstitutional ordinance is fraught with danger to the State of Louisiana and to the national Democratic party. I therefore vote 'no.'"

Mr. Carver said: "I feel constrained to vote against any plan that incorporates the payment of a poll tax as a prerequisite for voting, as does section 6 of this ordinance. Such a provision in my judgment violates the canons of taxation and the cause of suffrage as well. I think it is unwise, dangerous, inexpedient, and contrary to the sound principles of government."

Mr. Chenet said: "I vote against the ordinance in its present form because, in my opinion, section 5 is unconstitutional."

Mr. Drosman said: "I am opposed to poll tax as incorporated in this bill."

Mr. Strickland said: "It contains a section, section 5, which, in my opinion, will work great wrongs and damage to the best interests of the people of the State, which violates the fundamental principles of free government, all the accepted theories of free government, all the accepted theories of suffrage, and is undemocratic, un-American, and unconstitutional. The adoption of said section 5 will, in my judgment, compel the repeal of the Australian ballot law, a wise and good law, and without which a large majority of the members of this convention could not have been elected, and whose enactment by a Democratic legislature was one of the best and most patriotic acts in the history of the State."

Mr. Wise said: "I am opposed to the adoption of this ordinance because I believe an educational and property qualification in the alternative, with the payment of a poll tax as a prerequisite for voting, would meet the exigencies of the situation, and because I believe section 5 is unconstitutional and vicious and undemocratic in principle."

Mr. C. K. Browning said: "I oppose section 5 on the grounds of its unconstitutionality, and section 6 on principle, believing such a requirement un-American, undemocratic, and unjust, and by every honest and manly method endeavored to defeat it, and have gone on record on these lines."

Mr. J. T. Boone said: "I oppose this ordinance for the following reasons: The educational and property qualifications are placed beyond the reach of many of our best citizens. These citizens are too proud to vote because their father could vote. They desire to vote because they are white men and good citizens, and have always tried to do their duty as such. They are poor and unlearned, but honest. Their property, in consequence of depreciated values, is not worth $300, and they will be unable without assistance to file the application required for registration required by this ordinance. The poll tax should go into effect at once. The fifth section is of such doubtful constitutionality as to cause me to withhold my support. For these reasons, I vote no."

Mr. Paul Leche said: "I vote no. First, because I believe section 5 of the ordinance is unconstitutional; that it is unfair in giving naturalized foreigners an advantage over native citizens, and the registration thereunder is not sufficiently safeguarded against fraud."

Mr. J. E. Moore said: "I am unalterably opposed to certain provisions of the bill. * * * I am opposed to section 5, because it is unconstitutional, and, further, I regard that portion of it which allows the sons and grandsons of a certain class of voters to vote without other qualifications as undemocratic and thoroughly vicious."

Mr. Hart said: "I vote against ordinance 205, because I consider section 5 in conflict with the Constitution of the United States."

Mr. Henry G. Hester said: "In voting on this measure in its earliest stages I have expressed my opposition to it, fearing that it is an uncertain and dangerous experiment which may possibly defeat the main objects for which this convention was called."

Dr. H. Dickson Bruns said: "I desire to be recorded as voting against Ordinance No. 205, because I believe it to be indefensible in reason, law, or morals. I vote 'no' because, although I have friends in the opposition in whose integrity I have the fullest confidence, I believe they have been misled into that they will soon regret. I vote 'no' because, whether unconstitutional or not, in the light of legal technical knowledge it is undoubtedly so in the light of common sense, because this ordinance, while ostensibly ostentatiously pretending to qualify the suffrage, contains a section that will admit men to the electorate in spite of every disqualification; because while pretending to exclude all but legally naturalized foreigners, it expressly permits, through the intervention of an interpreter, the registration of American (?) citizens in every jargon in the world. I vote 'no' because it incorporates in the organic law the un-American doctrine that a man shall be a voter because his father or grandfather once possessed that right. I vote 'no' because the ordinance while providing in Article II a summary process by which persons excluded from registration may appeal for redress to the highest court of the State, and that without cost, it denies by express provision incorporated by the same process formal amendment of justification against the permanent roll of unqualified voters, while granting it against the roll of voters qualified by reason of property or education. I vote 'no' because, while admitting the principle of a poll tax, it gives the shadow and withholds the substance of benefit for two years by a unique exception to the time of the effect of this constitution. I vote 'no' because I believe that that ordinance, No. 205, as now written violates justice, law, and morals, and I have faith that every such violation inexorably evolves in the fullness of time its own punishment upon the violator, be it a man, a party, or a State."

Mr. Soulé said: "Mr. President and gentlemen, I desire to record my vote against the entire bill (205) for the following, among other reasons:

"I consider that certain sections of the bill are glaringly unconstitutional, undemocratic, and un-American. Were I alone in my opposition to this bill, and particularly to section 5, I would have remained silent and not have uttered another word on the floor of this convention, for the reason that I would have considered that I was in error; but when I consider the fact that both of our Senators in Washington, and many of their associates, condemn in unmeasured terms said section and declare that our representation in Congress and our Presidential electors might be jeopardized, and when I further consider the fact that a majority of the members of this very convention have openly expressed their dissatisfaction to some and were induced to vote for some only on the ground of expediency, I can not but take issue with the majority and urge that the adoption of said sections will work great injury to the State at large and eventually cause the disruption of the Democratic party in Louisiana, because it discriminates as between the whites and the blacks—the whites against whites, and the native-born citizens against foreign or naturalized citizens."

I desire now to reiterate briefly the arguments that I have repeatedly urged against the obnoxious section 5, and which are as follows:

It is now proposed to allow any male citizen the right of voting who was on January 1, 1867, or at any date prior thereto, entitled to vote under the constitution or statutes of any State of the United States wherein he then resided, and to the son or grandson of any such person.

Now, Mr. President, the manifest purpose or motive of this clause is to discriminate in favor of the whites and against the blacks; because it is a well-known fact that on January 1, 1867, the blacks were not voters in Louisiana, and only the whites were electors. If this be so, it is clearly made to debar the blacks as a class of citizens of the United States from the right of suffrage, and in this manner violates the fifteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

But I am told that certain States of the Union had granted to the blacks the right of voting prior to said date, and therefore this section does not discriminate against that class. If the prohibition of the Federal Constitution was limited to the color line that argument might be conclusive, but the authors of that amendment did not stop there; they added the words, "previous condition of servitude."

Why is it that the blacks were allowed to vote in certain States and were denied that privilege in others? It is simply because some few Northern States considered them citizens from the date of their emancipation and others denied them that right, and why? Simply on account of their previous condition of servitude. It is patent, therefore, that you are discriminating against certain colored citizens in the very teeth of a constitutional provision of the United States Senate, and you thereby render not only this section liable to a serious attack, but the whole suffrage clause, for the reason that if one brick in the edifice be demolished you make such a breach therein that it may all fall from that inherent defect.

But I am told, Mr. President, that we must not be concerned as to the effects of laws; that a law may be unconstitutional in its effect, but may be nevertheless valid. This would unquestionably be true if the motive or purpose was constitutional. * * * But, Mr. President, under what constitution or statutes of the State of Louisiana, or any other State, prior to 1867, do the majority wish to stand? Clearly not under the constitution of 1864 and the laws passed thereunder, for the reason that Congress by act of March 2, 1867, declared that "no legal State government or adequate protection for life or property existed in the Southern States," and thereby set aside said constitution and necessarily all laws in so far as suffrage was concerned. It follows, therefore, that no valid ordinance can be predicated upon something illegal. * * * If, therefore, there were no constitutions or statutes existing prior to 1867 upon which you can stand to base this suffrage clause, why, then it becomes perfectly useless and should be entirely eliminated.

It is useless for us to butt our heads against the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments; they are stone walls and can not be assailed by any human ingenuity. We might as well recognize the fact that from the beginning of the war until the acts of Congress which granted Louisianians the right of suffrage, in 1867, and their ratification by the adoption of the constitution of 1868, they possessed it not, neither under the constitution of any of the Southern States, nor under any statutes thereunder.

Another objection that I make to this section is that it is ambiguous in this, that the words "son and grandson" may mean legitimate, as some contend, and may mean illegitimate. As for me, I consider that it may mean both, for the reason that these words must be understood in their broadest signification.

The consequence will be that in certain parishes the registrar of voters will admit all descendants of voters prior to 1867—some blacks, many mulattoes, and some whites—and in others the registrar will understand the law differently.

* * * * * * *

I therefore, Mr. President, will demand that these very reasons should be embodied in the journal, because I wish it to be well understood that the great city of New Orleans, which I have the honor to represent, does not need such a law, * * * and that it will give to certain parishes unfair advantage over our city.

* * * * * * *

Feeling convinced, therefore, that this whole ordinance is wrong in principle, inexpedient, and unwise, and that I voice the sentiments of my constituents, I now desire to vote "no."

Mr. President, these are about the views held by a large majority of the voters of North Carolina on this same question, and for such reasons they will vote to repudiate the amendment next August.

THE OPINION OF THE LEADING DEMOCRATIC PAPER IN LOUISIANA.

In addition to these expressions by members of the Louisiana constitutional convention, I call attention to the following editorial that appeared in the New Orleans Times-Democrat, the leading Democratic paper of Louisiana, on Friday morning, March 25, 1898, the next day after the adoption of section 5 by the convention:

TRIUMPH OF POLITICIANS.

After themselves disavowing and fiercely denouncing section 5, a majority of the members of the constitutional convention yesterday passed that offensive section—offensive to Democracy, to political honesty, and to Americanism. * * * And the convention, too, has passed this offensive section in the face of the fact that the ablest Democrats in the United States Senate have declared it to be unconstitutional. Senators CAFFERY and MCENERY have both protested against its passage and have declared that it contravenes the Federal Constitution. In this opinion they are joined by such stalwart Democrats and uncompromising State-rights Senators and Congressmen as the following: * * *

Then follows the names of Senators and Congressmen who are recognized as among the ablest constitutional lawyers in this body and in the other House. The New Orleans Times-Democrat has not since that time changed its opinion as to the unconstitutionality of this measure. That paper in many recent editorials has repeated the opinion that was expressed the day after the action of the convention. I read the following from an editorial of recent issue:

The people of North Carolina will vote in August on the proposed constitutional amendment disfranchising the negroes from voting, and which contains the famous "grandfather clause" borrowed from the Louisiana constitution. * * * The grandfather clause, which the Louisiana constitutional convention invented, is objected to as of doubtful constitutionality, containing elements of great danger, and besides altogether unnecessary. * * * The theory that the opposition to the grandfather clause comes from the Republicans is wholly untrue. The Northern Democrats have unanimously declared against this plan of disfranchising the negro as unconstitutional.

WHAT THE WASHINGTON POST SAYS.

The Washington Post, which has never joined in the sectional crusade against the people of the South, and which probably understands the peculiar social and industrial conditions of our section better than any other Northern paper, takes the same view. Indeed, the Post is the strongest defender that the South has among Northern papers. Yet that paper denounces the amendment as unconstitutional and wicked in morals. I read the following extract from a recent editorial:

It is to be hoped that Senator BUTLER speaks by inspiration when he predicts the defeat of the North Carolina suffrage amendment.

* * * * * * *

If it sought simply to make the act of voting an intelligent and enlightened function and to reduce to a minimum the opportunities of bribery and corruption, we should hail it as a step toward purity and wholesomeness in politics. But, as we see the matter, the scheme is simply to disfranchise the negro because he is black, and to protect at least a majority of the whites who would otherwise be disfranchised under an impartial application of the same rule.

North Carolina, in a word, has borrowed from Louisiana the iniquitous expedient whereby illiterate white voters may retain the franchise enjoyed by their fathers or grandfathers in 1867, no matter what may be their personal disqualifications under the restrictions imposed upon the negroes without exception. We believe the plan to be unconstitutional, as we know it has been so denounced by both the Louisiana Senators in the case of their own State, and we have not the slightest doubt that it is wicked in morals as it is stupid and blundering in expediency.

The defeat of this measure will be a national benefaction.

AN ABSURD CLAIM—A SLANDER UPON THE SUPREME COURT.

Before passing from this part of the discussion, I desire to refer to one other argument that I have heard advanced in support of this proposed amendment.

A certain judge in my State, who has a reputation not only for considerable legal learning, but also for high character and conscientiousness of motive, was appealed to to write a legal opinion in support of section 5. The judge wrote an article in response, but hardly a legal opinion. The sum and substance of his article, after attempting to prove that the white man was superior to the negro (which every advocate of this provision seems to feel called upon to do), was to express the hope that the Supreme Court of the United States would take note of the fact that public opinion had changed in regard to the fifteenth amendment and would hence uphold section 5, though in violation of it.

Since that time I have noticed that one of the leading Democratic candidates for governor in my State has written an article taking the same position. I do not deem it necessary to reply to such a claim, for its evident absurdity upon a mere statement of the same is a sufficient reply. If I could believe that these men are serious in claiming that the Supreme Court of the United States would themselves violate their oaths and nullify by their decision the United States Constitution, then I would be constrained to say that no one has ever uttered a more serious slander against said court. I take it that no court will ever assume such a position, no matter how high or strong public opinion may be. The court can not recognize public opinion as far as the fundamental law of the land is concerned until said public opinion is crystallized into a constitutional repeal or amendment through the prescribed constitutional methods. To the court the fifteenth amendment represents public opinion on the suffrage question until public sentiment has forced the repeal or the amendment of that provision. If the fifteenth amendment is wrong, then its only remedy is its repeal. While it stands the court must and will uphold it.

THE REMAINDER OF THE AMENDMENT WILL STAND.

Mr. President, I come now to consider the second question, which is: Section 5 being unconstitutional, will the court in declaring it so hold that all the amendment must fall, or that only section 5 (the unconstitutional part) must fall, leaving the remainder of the amendment, which is clearly constitutional, to stand? In my opinion the court would follow the many precedents already laid down in similar cases, and hold that, inasmuch as section 5 has one object and the remainder of the amendment has a very different object and are therefore severable, and inasmuch as the amendment with section 5 (the unconstitutional part) left out would still be operative and intelligible and would make a complete and constitutional scheme for limiting suffrage, it would stand, while section 5 would be eliminated. I make this statement as my opinion because the decisions of the Supreme Court sustain that position, which I will presently show. But before proceeding to quote these authorities and make an argument upon them, I wish to note briefly the two cases cited by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] which he claims establish a different doctrine. He read first from Sprague vs. Thompson (118 U. S., page 90), as follows:

> The insuperable difficulty with the application of a principle of construction to the present instance is that by rejecting the exception intended by the legislature of Georgia the statute is made to enact what confessedly the legislature never meant. It confers upon the statute a positive operation beyond the legislative intent, and beyond what anyone could say it would have enacted, in view of the illegality of the exception.

Next he cites Warren vs. Mayor and Aldermen of Charlestown (68 Mass.), and quotes the following from that decision:

> When parts of a statute are so mutually connected and dependent as conditions, considerations, or compensation for each other as to warrant a belief that the legislature intended them as a whole, and that if all could not be carried into effect the legislature would not pass the residue independently—if such parts are unconstitutional and void, all the provisions which are thus dependent, conditional, or connected must fall with them.

The Senator from Mississippi, after reading these two decisions, one a decision of the Supreme Court and the other a decision of the State court of Massachusetts, proceeded to say that these cases were not only exactly in point, but that they settled the question. The Senate will remember that at that point in his speech I asked permission to interrupt the Senator; that I had on my desk nine or ten volumes of the Supreme Court Reports, and held in my hand a statement of the cases in those reports which I stated showed that the Senator was wrong as to the weight of authority on his side. I asked permission of the Senator to read from these cases, which he declined. I then asked permission for a simple statement of the names of the cases to go into the RECORD with his speech, so that those who read his speech might also, if they desired, read these cases and know what the court had held. The Senator declined to permit even the title of those cases to go into the RECORD along with his speech. He declared that he did not mean to be discourteous, but he said that he would rather not have those cases cited in his speech.

Now, let us for a moment examine the two cases cited by the Senator. I have just read from the RECORD the two extracts which he read from those cases and upon which he relied. They are both to the effect that the court must consider, among other things, the legislative intent in deciding whether an unconstitutional part of a statute shall fall alone or drag the remainder of the statute with it. This is true, I admit, to a certain extent and in a certain sense; but it is not the only consideration with the court, and is not by any means, as a rule, the controlling consideration, even where the intent of the legislature is clear. To say that the Supreme Court will never declare any one section of a statute void and leave the remainder to stand, where it is clear that the legislature would not have passed one part without passing the others, is practically to say that the court will never declare one section of any statute void without declaring the whole statute void, even though constitutional.

It is to be presumed that every legislature and every Congress when it passes an act intends it all to stand, or it would not have passed it. I make that statement to show that the quotation of the Senator, without qualification or explanation, is an absurdity in the sense in which he used it. In short, his quotations standing alone clearly misrepresent the position of the court. Was the Supreme Court of the United States governed by the intent of Congress in the income-tax cases? Was it not perfectly clear and unquestioned that Congress never would have passed the Wilson-Gorman tariff act with the rates of tariff duties that it contained had not Congress at the same time and in the same act put in a provision for an income tax to raise thirty or forty millions of revenue? Probably every schedule in that act would have been changed if those income-tax provisions had not been in it. Not only did attorneys call the attention of the court to this fact, but also did Justice Harlan and other justices, in their dissenting opinions. Justice Harlan said:

> The judgment just rendered defeats the purpose of Congress by taking out of the revenue not less than thirty millions and possibly fifty millions of dollars, expected to be raised by the duty on incomes. We know from the official Journals of both Houses of Congress that taxation on imports would not have been reduced to the extent it was by the Wilson Act except for the belief that that could be safely done if the country had the benefit of revenue derived from a tax on incomes. We know from official sources that each House of Congress distinctly refused to strike out the provisions imposing a tax on incomes. The two Houses indicated in every possible way that it must be a part of any scheme for the reduction of taxation and for raising revenue for the support of the Government; that (with certain specified exceptions) incomes arising from every kind of property and from every trade and calling should bear some of the burdens of the taxation imposed.

Yet the court, regardless of the clear intent of Congress, knocked out as unconstitutional the income-tax provision, while leaving the other sections.

THE LEGISLATIVE INTENT.

But, Mr. President, the two decisions cited by the Senator, even if they represented the weight of authority and fixed an unvarying rule of the court (which they do not), would not apply to the present case in the least unless the court should be convinced that the legislature would not have attempted to restrict suffrage at all unless it could do so by placing the restriction upon former slaves and their descendants while leaving all other citizens free to vote without any restrictions. To say that such was the intention of the legislature would be to make the legislature ridiculous. Would not the court rather conclude that the intention of the legislature was to restrict suffrage by an educational test, and that after having done this it made an attempt through section 5 to exempt, if possible, a certain class from its operations, which every lawyer in the legislature must have known, to say the least, was of very doubtful constitutionality?

There are many reasons to believe that the legislature did not expect section 5 to stand the test of the court, while they did expect the remainder to stand. When the Louisiana amendment was being discussed in that State convention, such admissions were made on the floor by delegates who were good lawyers. I read from the Harvard Law Review of December, 1899, from an article entitled "Suffrage clause of the Louisiana constitution." Mr. Eaton, the author of this article, reviews the proceedings of that convention. Judge Simms, a member of that convention, while advocating the insertion of section 5 in opposition to the advice of the two Senators from that State and of many other distinguished lawyers, called attention to the fact that if section 5 should be declared unconstitutional there would still remain a good constitutional working scheme.

He expressed the opinion in the convention that if section 5 should fall the remainder would stand; and that same opinion was expressed by others supporting the amendment, and in the face of that the convention adopted the constitutional amendment. The only difference, he declared, would be that the special class of illiterate upon whom they tried to confer the right to vote under section 5 would be prevented from voting and would have to stand the same educational test with the negro. Gen. T. F. Bell, who was chairman of the suffrage committee of that convention, when reporting the amendment with section 5 to the convention, in answer to objections to section 5, said:

> If it fails in the courts, you will still have a fairly good system with section 5 out.

Would not the court look at that declaration, provided it looked at anything outside of the act itself?

Mr. President, it was after explanations like this that the amendment was adopted by the convention. All of this, and more, too, was known to the legislatnre in North Carolina when it adopted a similar provision. Indeed, a delegation came to Washington City, in behalf of the legislature, to confer with Louisiana Senators and other Senators about the suffrage provisions in their respective States.

The leading daily at Raleigh published full reports of interviews which showed that the general consensus of opinion in Washington was that section 5 would not stand the test of the court, and the editor of that paper recommended that the legislature adopt the Mississippi suffrage provision instead of the Louisiana provision, on account of the danger of the court knocking out section 5.

Mr. President, I have here a copy of the paper, the Raleigh News and Observer, containing that editorial. This is the same paper to which I have referred, one of the leading Democratic dailies of Raleigh. The editor editorially advises the legislature to put both the Mississippi plan and the Louisiana plan in the same amendment, and then proceeds to say:

If, however, the courts should declare the "son and grandson" clause unconstitutional, there would then remain the "understanding" clause, which in Mississippi has operated to secure the uninterrupted exercise of the elective franchise to those white voters who are not learned in the books.

It was the information to be gathered by that delegation in Washington that was to guide the legislature in adopting a suffrage amendment. The information they got showed that the probabilities, to say the least, were that section 5 would fall. Then the editor of this Democratic daily advises that both the Mississippi plan and section 5 of the Louisiana plan be put into the same amendment, so that if section 5 should fall in the courts the Mississippi plan would still remain. Yet, after all this, and in the face of it, the legislature adopted this Louisiana plan. So if the court should look for intent outside of the substance of the act itself it could find abundant reasons for believing that the legislature adopted this provision knowing or at least seriously doubting the constitutionality of section 5, and knowing or having reasonable grounds to believe that the court would eliminate that section, leaving the remainder to stand.

SECTIONS 4 AND 5 ARE DISTINCT AND SEVERABLE.

But the tendency of the decisions of our court has been to look to the effect of a statute rather than to the intention of the legislature when the question is, Shall all of the statute fall or only a part? And this is always true where the unconstitutional section has one object and the constitutional section has another object. The leading test applied by the court in all such cases has been, Will the remainder of the statute be intelligible and operative after the unconstitutional parts are stricken out? As I have already said, this is exactly what the court did in the income-tax case.

In Penniman's case (103 U. S. Reports, page 113), Judge Wood, delivering the opinion of the court, says:

Statutes that are constitutional in part only will be upheld so far as they are not in conflict with the Constitution, provided the allowed and prohibited parts are severable. So that if so much of the section under consideration as relieves the debtor from imprisonment for debt is constitutional and can be severed from the other parts of the enactment, the judgment of the supreme court of Rhode Island should be affirmed. That part of the section which relates to the imprisonment of the debtor and that which relates to the seizure of his property are entirely distinct and independent, and either one can stand and be operative, though the other should be declared void.

Now, is it not clear that the other sections of the proposed amendment can "stand and be operative, though the other (section 5) is declared void?" Clearly so, because when section 5 is declared void and eliminated, the remainder of the amendment makes a complete and constitutional scheme for limiting suffrage by an educational qualification applying to all classes alike.

The decisions of the court to the same effect as in Penniman's case are numerous and overwhelming. I will, however, cite only a few more.

The Supreme Court, in the case of Presser vs. Illinois (116 U. S.), lays down the same doctrine. Mr. Justice Wood, delivering the opinion of the court, in which one section of an act was declared invalid, while the remainder of the act was sustained, in closing the argument of the court and giving the reasons for the decision of the court, says:

But it is a settled rule that statutes that are constitutional in part only will be upheld so far as they are not in conflict with the Constitution, provided the allowed and prohibited parts are severable.

As an authority for this position the court cites Penniman's case, from which I have just quoted, and many other cases. This has always been the rule of the Supreme Court. Many early decisions could be cited.

I call attention to Bank vs. Dudley (2 Peters, 492), decision rendered in 1829. Chief Justice Marshall rendered the decision of the court in that case, in which he said:

If any parts of an act be unconstitutional, the provisions of that part may be disregarded, while full effect will be given to such as are not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States or to the ordinance of 1787.

In Packet Company vs. Keokuk (95 U. S., page 80), Mr. Justice Strong, delivering the opinion of the court, says:

Admitting that parts of the ordinance under consideration may be in conflict with the Constitution and laws of the United States, it does not follow that its objectionable provisions, when capable of being separated and enforced, will be set aside and its legislative purposes defeated.

Continuing, the court says:

Statutes that are constitutional in part only will be upheld so far as they are not in conflict with the Constitution, provided the allowed and prohibited parts are severable. We think a severance is possible in this case.

The facts in this case are: The legislature of Iowa had given the city of Keokuk, in its charter, the power to establish and regulate wharfs and to fix the rates of landing and wharfage of all boats, rafts, and water craft moored at or landing at the wharf. Acting under this power, the city passed an ordinance providing such regulation. The ordinance referred to but one thing and had but one purpose, and that was regulating the rates, etc., as I have stated. Yet the court declared that the fourth section of this ordinance was unconstitutional and void, while leaving the other five or six sections to stand, for the reason given by the court in the opinion I have just read.

In the case of Supervisor vs. Stanley (105 U. S., page 303), Mr. Chief Justice Waite, delivering the opinion of the court, said:

The general proposition must be conceded that in a statute which contains invalid or unconstitutional provisions that which is unaffected by these provisions or which can stand without them must remain. If the valid and invalid are capable of separation, only the latter are to be disregarded.

The cases from which I have read cite many other cases to the same effect. In fact, the cases which I have read state that they set forth the law as uniformly held by the court.

Mr. President, I could go to State decisions and cite numerous authorities to the same effect. I will, however, take a recent one which is in harmony with all the former decisions. This is the case of Russell vs. Ayer (120 N. C. Reports), decided a year or two ago, in which the court says:

While the parts of sections 2 and 3 of the act above referred to which concern the amounts of the capitation tax are void, because they disturb the equation between property and poll taxes, yet the remainder of the act is valid; and that although the revenue act of 1897 contains a clause which repeals all acts and parts of acts contrary to its provisions, yet the parts of sections 2 and 3 of the act of 1897 being unconstitutional and void, it follows that those parts of sections 2 and 3 of chapter 116 of the acts of 1895, which levy the amounts of capitation and property tax, are unrepealed and are in full force and effect.

Now, how does the law as set forth in those cases, which is the rule followed by the court, apply to the present case?

If there ever was a case where sections are severable, surely this constitutional amendment presents that case. Section 5 is not dependent upon any other section, nor is the remainder of the act incomplete in any sense without it. Indeed, section 5 attempts to do one thing, while all of the remainder of the act attempts to do just the opposite. There are two different purposes attempted by the two different sections; and I take it everyone will admit that the authorities are uniform that where that is so, there is no question but that the section which is invalid will fall, and the others will stand. Every standard work on constitutional limitations or constitutional construction is along the line of these decisions, and show clearly that in a case like this section 5 would fall, leaving the remainder of the amendment to stand.

GARBLED EXTRACTS FROM A GREAT AUTHORITY.

I would not consider it necessary to dwell further on this matter had not the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] read some extracts from Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, which he claims is authority to the contrary. I regret that the Senator is not in his seat, for I would much prefer for him to be present while I read this authority, because the Senator's quotation misrepresents the text. I do not want to believe, and will not charge, that the Senator intended willfully to misrepresent the text; but his quotation does it, and I must call attention to it in the interests of truth, so that the law may go into the RECORD correct. The Senator objected to me correcting him while he was speaking, so I must do it now.

Mr. PETTUS. To what Senator is the Senator from North Carolina referring?

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY]. I have in my hand the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD containing his speech, in which he quotes from Cooley's Constitutional Limitations. I read from the RECORD:

The constitutional and unconstitutional provisions may even be contained in the same section and yet be perfectly distinct and separable, so that the first may stand though the last fall. The point is not whether they are contained in the same section, for the distribution into sections is purely artificial, but whether they are essentially and inseparably connected in substance. If, when the constitutional portion is stricken out, that which remains is complete in itself and capable of being executed in accordance with the apparent legislative intent, wholly independent of that which was rejected, it must be sustained.

Mr. President, when I look at the text I find that what the Senator quoted is here, but he skips two sentences, and then quotes the following:

But if its purpose is to accomplish a single object only, and some of its provisions are void, the whole must fail unless sufficient remains to effect the object without the aid of the invalid portion.

But in the text there are two sentences between those read by the Senator, which he skipped. Now, why should the Senator skip them when they bear directly on the question at issue and state the opposite contention from what he read in the next sentence? I submit it is not a fair presentation of the authority. The Senator surely did not himself examine the text. He must have been misled by some one who made the extracts for him. Here are the sentences that were skipped:

The difficulty is in determining whether the good and bad parts of the statute are capable of being separated within the meaning of this rule. If a statute attempts to accomplish two or more objects and is void as to one, it may still be in every respect complete and valid as to the other.

Mr. President, the significance of that sentence is that it applies directly to the case under discussion; and if the Senator had put that sentence in between the sentences he quoted, he would have been quoting a direct authority for my contention and not for his.

Mr. President, we are all familiar with how the late Bob Ingersoll quoted the Bible to prove that there was no God. We are also told that the devil quotes Scripture to justify his course. But it is also well known that when they do they garble the text by selecting an extract here and there and leaving out the qualifying and essential parts important and necessary for a correct construction. Quotations made in this way can be gotten to prove that black is white, that wrong is right, and that things that are unconstitutional are constitutional.

Mr. President, in order that no one may be misled and that everyone may know exactly the law as laid down by this eminent authority, I ask permission at this point to put into the RECORD everything that Judge Cooley says on this question, beginning on page 214, under the subhead "Statutes unconstitutional in part," down to page 219, where the discussion under that subhead ends.

The quotation referred to is as follows:

STATUTES UNCONSTITUTIONAL IN PART.

It will sometimes be found that an act of the legislature is opposed in some of its provisions to the constitution, while others, standing by themselves, would be unobjectionable. So the forms observed in passing it may be sufficient for some of the purposes sought to be accomplished by it, but insufficient for others. In any such case the portion which conflicts with the constitution, or in regard to which the necessary conditions have not been observed, must be treated as a nullity. Whether the other parts of the statute must also be adjudged void because of the association must depend upon a consideration of the object of the law, and in what manner and to what extent the unconstitutional portion affects the remainder.

A statute, it has been said, is judicially held to be unconstitutional because it is not within the scope of legislative authority. It may either propose to accomplish something prohibited by the constitution or to accomplish some lawful and even laudable object by means repugnant to the Constitution of the United States or of the State. A statute may contain some such provisions, and yet the same act, having received the same sanction of all branches of the legislature, and being in the form of law, may contain other useful and salutary provisions not obnoxious to any just constitutional exception. It would be inconsistent with all just principles of constitutional law to adjudge these enactments void because they are associated in the same act, but not connected with or dependent on others which are unconstitutional.

Where, therefore, a part of a statute is unconstitutional, that fact does not authorize the courts to declare the remainder void also, unless all the provisions are connected in subject-matter, depending on each other, operating together for the same purpose, or otherwise so connected together in meaning that it can not be presumed the legislature would have passed the one without the other. The constitutional and the unconstitutional provisions may even be contained in the same section and yet be perfectly distinct and separable, so that the first may stand though the last fall.

The point is not whether they are contained in the same section—for the distribution into sections is purely artificial—but whether they are essential and inseparably connected in substance. If, when the unconstitutional portion is stricken out, that which remains is complete in itself and capable of being executed, wholly independent of that which was rejected, it must be sustained. The difficulty is in determining whether the good and bad parts of the statute are capable of being separated within the meaning of this rule. If a statute attempts to acomplish two or more objects, and is void as to one, it may still be in every respect complete and valid as to the other.

But if its purpose is to accomplish a single object only and some of its provisions are void, the whole must fail unless sufficient remains to effect the object without the aid of the invalid portion. And if they are so mutually connected with and dependent on each other, as conditions, considerations, or compensations for each other, as to warrant the belief that the legislature intended them as a whole, and, if all could not be carried into effect, the legislature would not pass the residue independently; then if some parts are unconstitutional, all the provisions which are thus dependent, conditional, or connected must fall with them.

It has accordingly been held, where a statute submitted to the voters of a county the question of the removal of their county seat, and one section imposed the forfeiture of certain vested rights in case the vote was against the removal, that, this portion of the act being void, the whole must fail, inasmuch as the whole was submitted to the electors collectively, and the threatened forfeiture would naturally affect the result of the vote.

And where a statute annexed to the city of Racine certain lands previously in the township of Racine, but contained an express provision that the lands so annexed should be taxed at a different and less rate than other lands in the city, the latter provision being held unconstitutional, it was also held that the whole statute must fail, inasmuch as such provision was clearly intended as a compensation for the annexation.

And where a statute, in order to obtain a jury of six persons, provided for the summoning of twelve jurors from whom six were to be chosen and sworn, and under the constitution the jury must consist of twelve, it was held that the provision for reducing the number to six could not be rejected and the statute sustained, inasmuch as this would be giving to it a construction and effect different from that the legislature designed.

On the other hand, to illustrate how intimately the valid and invalid portions of a statute may be associated, a section of the criminal code of Illinois provided that "if any person shall harbor or secrete any negro, mulatto, or person of color, the same being a slave or servant, owing service or labor to any other persons, whether they reside in this State or in any other State or Territory or District within the limits and under the jurisdiction of the United States, or shall in anywise hinder or prevent the lawful owner or owners of such slaves or servants from retaking them in a lawful manner, every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor," etc., and it was held that although the latter portion of the section was void within the decision in Prigg vs. Pennsylvania, yet that the first portion, being a police regulation for the preservation of order in the State and important to its well-being and capable of being enforced without reference to the rest, was not affected by the invalidity of the rest.

A legislative act may be entirely valid as to some classes of cases and clearly void as to others. A general law for the punishment of offenses which should endeavor to reach, by its retroactive operation, acts before committed, as well as to prescribe a rule of conduct for the citizen in the future, would be void so far as it was retrospective, but such invalidity would not affect the operation of the law in regard to the cases which were within the legislative control. A law might be void as violating the obligation of existing contracts, but valid as to all contracts which should be entered into subsequent to its passage, and which, therefore, would have no legal force except such as the law itself would allow. In any such case the unconstitutional law must operate as far as it can, and it will not be held invalid on the objection of a party whose interests are not affected by it in a manner which the constitution forbids. If there are any exceptions to this rule, they must be of cases only where it is evident, from a contemplation of the statute and of the purpose to be accomplished by it, that it would not have been passed at all except as an entirety, and that the general purpose of the legislature will be defeated if it shall be held valid as to some cases and void as to others.

Mr. President, the above is the full text of the law on this question as set forth by that distinguished authority. Those who have listened to it will be more convinced of the absolute correctness of the contention I stand for than if they simply read what I had already quoted.

Mr. President, I call attention to several illustrations given by Mr. Cooley in the matter I have asked to put in the RECORD toward the latter part of his discussion, illustrations to show when a court will knock out one section and retain the remainder of an act. The sections of the proposed amendment under discussion, sections 4 and 5, present a stronger case for separation than a single one cited by that authority.

While on this question I would quote another standard authority. I quote from Pomeroy's Constitutional Construction, page 554, in which the author, in discussing this very question, says:

It is well settled that an act may be void in part by reason of its violation of a constitutional provision, and good as to the remainder. "If any part of the act be unconstitutional," said the Supreme Court of the United States, "the provisions of that part may be disregarded, while full effect will be given to such as are not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, or of the State, or to the ordinance of 1787."

Every authority on constitutional law takes the same position.

Now, Mr. President, do not these facts and these authorities prove, as conclusively as anything can be proven in advance, that the court will declare that section 5 is unconstitutional and that it will hold that the remainder of the amendment—which is constitutional, and which is a logical, complete, and constitutional scheme for limiting suffrage—shall stand? If this is true,

WHAT WILL BE THE RESULT?

What would be the effect of the operation of the proposed North Carolina amendment with section 5 eliminated? No one familiar with the facts or who will take the trouble to examine the census reports will deny that the result will be to disfranchise fifty or sixty thousand white voters—indeed, as many white voters as colored voters. I regret to say it, and would not advertise the fact if the threatened danger of disfranchisement of this large number of the sturdy yeomanry of the State did not demand it, that North Carolina has a larger percentage of illiterate whites than any other State in the Union. Therefore, the adoption of such a disfranchising scheme would result in disfranchising a larger per cent of good substantial men in my State than in any other State in the Union. These illiterate white men are not like the class of illiterates who make up the slums of the great cities, but they are, as a rule, sturdy and as worthy citizens as North Carolina has within her borders. They are noted for their honesty, integrity, industry, and patriotism. They are the descendants of the Revolutionary patriots who fought at Kings Mountain, Moores Creek, Guilford Court-House, and on every field in the Revolution. Many of them are old men and Confederate soldiers, who are now too old to start to school and get an education even if they had the time and money to do so. Many of this class volunteered and entered the United States Army in the late war with Spain.

They are intensely patriotic and never fail to respond with their life and blood and their all when their country needs their services or when duty calls. Let it be remembered that in the late war North Carolina, with only about 110,000 voters, furnished over 120,000 soldiers. A large number of these men were illiterate, and many of their sons who grew up during or since the war have had even less opportunities or means to get an education. Now, what will be the result if this proposed amendment is adopted?

These men, who compose some of the very best and most substantial citizens of my State, would be disfranchised on account of the unconstitutionality of section 5, while the town negro dude would vote and be eligible to hold office according to the provisions of the amendment. This great danger, in addition to the belief that the amendment is unconstitutional, will cause a large majority of the voters of North Carolina to reject this amendment at the polls.

A CONFESSION AND AN ATTEMPTED AVOIDANCE.

The supporters of this amendment have recently realized that this is true. They have realized what this great, sturdy, honest element of illiterate whites in my State have made up their minds to do. In fact, they have just confessed that they can not sustain this measure by argument before the people. I hold in my hand the proof of that confession. On last Thursday Judge Brown, one of the State circuit court judges of North Carolina, while holding court at Wilmington, gave to the press an interview in which he not only expressed an opinion about the constitutionality of the proposed amendment, but he went further and advised his political friends to amend it in order to avert defeat at the polls. I will not at this time comment upon the impropriety of a judge expressing an opinion in advance and for political effect about an important question that is liable to come before his court for adjudication. I can only say I regret it. But I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the change in this amendment which he proposes.

He advises that when the legislature meets, at an adjourned meeting, before the election in August, that it amend the amendment by adding a new section, to be known as section 6. The form of the amendment that he advises the legislature to adopt is as follows:

SEC. 6. This act shall be construed and taken as a whole, and if any of its clauses, sections, and provisions shall for any reason become or be declared inoperative and invalid, the whole of this amendment and every part and section thereof shall become null and void and of no effect.

Every newspaper in the State that is supporting the amendment, so far as I have seen, has indorsed this suggestion. Within the last few days the chairman of the Democratic State committee has published a carefully prepared official interview not only indorsing the suggestion, but claiming that he is the father of it and first suggested it to the Judge. He goes further, and, speaking by authority, says that the legislature will meet and will amend the amendment by adding such a section. So I take it that it is proper to discuss this proposed amendment with this proposed section added.

Judge Brown has the reputation of being a good lawyer, so the Judge must know that the section that he proposes will not be considered by the court as a part of the amendment, but simply as a legislative declaration, even though it be ingrafted into the amendment as one of its sections. He must know, further, that the court, if it did not resent, would at least ignore, such an effort on the part of the legislature to instruct the court as to how it should construe a statute. In this country, where the legislative and judicial departments are entirely distinct, neither one is ever permitted to intrench upon the authority and domain of the other.

A LEGISLATURE CAN NOT INSTRUCT THE COURTS.

No court, so far as I know, has ever yet permitted any legislative body in North Carolina or anywhere else in this country to thus instruct them as to how they should construe a statute. The court never looks at the declaration that a legislature makes, but it looks at the substance of what it does and renders its judgment accordingly. The supreme court of North Carolina, in the case of Robinson vs. Barfield (2 Murphy), ignored such a declaration on the part of the legislature and in the decision said that the court would allow such declarations attempting to instruct the judiciary to remain "as dead letters on the statute books." Further on in the opinion, Judge Daniels, one of the ablest judges of the State, in delivering the opinion, said:

The court can neither nibble at the legislative power nor can the legislature stride over the judicial.

This doctrine was approved in Hoke vs. Henderson (1 Dev.) and in many other State decisions.

Within the last five years there have been, I think, at least a dozen cases in North Carolina where the courts have declared that notwithstanding the legislative declaration that it had done a certain thing, that the court would pay no attention to the declaration, but would look to the substance of what they did. I think I could cite at least 10 or 15 cases, but I take it that there is no authority to the contrary in any other State or in the United States Reports. I have not had time to look through all the United States Reports on this point, but every case I have found holds as I have stated. In the case of United States vs. Claflin (97 U. S. Reports) the court says:

A recital in a statute that a former statute was repealed or superseded by subsequent acts is not conclusive as to such repeal or supersedure. Whether a statute was repealed is a judicial, not a legislative question.

Whether section 5 will fall, leaving the remainder of the amendment to stand, is a judicial and not a legislative question, and it is a piece of impertinence on the part of the legislature to attempt to instruct the court as to how it shall construe a judicial question.

Mr. President, nothing is better settled than that an alternative judgment is void. Now, this proposed section instructs the court that if it thinks all of the sections of the amendment are constitutional, then to let all of them stand; but, on the other hand, if it should find one of the sections unconstitutional, that then it must declare the whole act unconstitutional. Such a proposition seems absurd.

The courts have uniformly held that when the legislature attempts to create a corporation, that if it fails to confer the essential powers necessary to make a corporation in the charter, that then a corporation has not been formed, even though the legislature declare in the same act its intention to create a corporation. And, on the other hand, if the legislature should confer the powers necessary to create a corporation, the court would hold that it was a corporation even though the legislature in the same act should declare that it did not intend to create a corporation. There is a case in the North Carolina Reports, which I have not had time to put my hands on, which declares that where the maker of a deed declared at the end thereof "that the above deed was made without fraud" that the declaration was not only void and of no effect to make the deed valid, but that the declaration was itself a badge of fraud. Just so this declaration, if made by the legislature of North Carolina, would not only not be considered by the court in rendering its decision, but its only purpose will be to serve to put the court on notice that the legislature, when it adopted this provision, itself doubted, to say the least, the constitutionality of section 5, and that they passed the provision in spite of this doubt and belief.

ANOTHER ATTEMPT TO FOOL THE VOTERS.

Judge Brown, in this interview, while expressing the opinion that the proposed amendment was constitutional, yet gave as his excuse for advising the legislature to adopt this new section that in his opinion the masses of the people could not understand legal argument. Therefore I take it that he offers this new section because he thinks the people will not be able to see its absurdity and utter futility. If he had less ability as a lawyer, it might be supposed that he had fooled himself.

But, Mr. President, this section, attempting to instruct the court how to construe the amendment, will not fool the voters of the State into supporting such a dangerous scheme. They have had intelligence enough to see the danger in section 5. The same intelligence will guard them against this new device. The voters of North Carolina are intelligent enough to know that there is not only grave, if not certain danger to from fifty to sixty thousand white voters in this amendment, but they also know that if this amendment were adopted and section 5 eliminated that no way under heaven could restore to those voters their ballot except by again amending the constitution. These thousands of illiterate white voters are intelligent enough to know that when once disfranchised they would have no vote to help change the amendment and help wipe out the wrong. They also know that the average politician only fears the people so long as they have a vote.

This proposed new section will not prevent the court from declaring section 5 invalid and holding that the remainder of the amendment shall stand, and no one knows it better than Judge Brown, and the voters will show at the election next August that they also know better.

IT PUTS THE SOUTH IN A FALSE POSITION.

Mr. President, this whole scheme is not only fraught with danger, but it is unnecessary. It not only puts the representation of the South in Congress and in the electoral college in jeopardy, but it also puts so many thousands of white voters themselves in danger. Section 5 is not only unconstitutional, but it is offensive to every principle of democracy; offensive to political honesty and to Americanism. Mr. President, it puts the South in a false and unenviable position to attempt to deal with suffrage in this miserably uncandid manner. It is a position that no Southern State should put itself in. It is dangerous, it is unnecessary, it is not honest. There are constitutional methods for dealing with the suffrage question whenever and wherever the necessity arises, without resorting to such undemocratic and unconstitutional and absurd subterfuges.

ANOTHER ABSURD SUGGESTION.

One word more on this subject. I notice that in the interview by the Democratic State chairman to which I referred a few minutes ago that he also advises the legislature when it meets to do another thing—to put sections 4 and 5 of this proposed amendment into one section, and he says that will lessen the danger of the courts knocking out section 5 and leaving section 4 to stand. That suggestion is absurd. There is not an authority in all the books but what holds that the court will knock out not only one section, but even one-half of a section, or one sentence of a section and let the other half stand, just as quick as they would knock out one section and leave another stand. Every lawyer with a thimble full of brains knows that. Then why is that suggestion made? Is it made in good faith? No! There can be but one purpose why a man who knows any law should make such a suggestion, and that is with the hope that it would fool some voters who are not lawyers. It is absurd, it is demagogy and falsehood, and yet that is one of the suggestions for another amendment when the legislature meets.

OTHER VERY SERIOUS OBJECTIONS.

Mr. President, there are other very serious objections to this proposed amendment, even if section 5 were constitutional. Let us briefly note a few of them. In the first place, what class of the negro population would be disfranchised by the amendment? It would be the good old country darkey who was as faithful and true as steel to our mothers, wives, and sisters during the late war, and who is a good citizen and a good laborer, who has never been offensive in politics nor in other ways.

Now, what class of negroes would be left to vote? There would be many thousands who would still vote, and this number would include all of that element who have been active and offensive in politics, and who, either from innate perversity or for a consideration, have furnished the capital necessary to enable the machine politicians to raise the negro cry and appeal to race prejudice.

In short, the only negroes who have ever made the race issue possible would be those who would not only be eligible to vote, but to hold office under the proposed amendment. The trifling negro dude, who talks loud and takes up all of the sidewalk, would be left with full power to vote. This class would be sufficient in number to be the balance of power in politics and to furnish an object lesson at any time to help the "negro-howling politicians" to raise their old cry.

But it is claimed by the supporters of this suffrage amendment that its adoption would remove the race question from the politics of the State and make it possible for economic and governmental issues to be discussed on their merits and passed upon by the voters intelligently. Mr. President, if this amendment were constitutional and would stand the test of the courts, it is clear that it would have no such effect. In the first place, I am constrained to observe that those who are making this claim are those who have been most active and diligent in appealing to race prejudice in every campaign in season and out of season. In the next place, this amendment, if adopted and if section 5 should be sustained by the court, would still leave about 50,000 negro voters in North Carolina. That is a larger number than there are to-day in the State of Kentucky. I am informed that there are only about 40,000 negro votes in that State. And yet see the appeals to race prejudice, the turbulence, violence, and appeal to passion and prejudice instead of to reason in that State. And the same would be true in North Carolina, were this amendment adopted, as long as there were politicians at the head of the party with no other purpose or ambition except to have power and office regardless of the great economic questions at issue and regardless of the welfare of the State.

This will be so as long as there are men at the head of any party who believe in ballot-box stuffing and all kinds of fraud and crime in order to defeat the will of the people and to put themselves in power. This will be so as long as such men are at the head of any party organization and can find one negro in sight to use as a scarecrow with which to appeal to race prejudice and banish reason, common sense, and justice. Now, shall we run the risk of disfranchising about 50,000 or 60,000 of as good white men as there are in North Carolina in order to secure the great privilege of having in that State a repetition of the kind of campaign that Kentucky had last year?

WHITE VOTERS WHO ARE SURE TO BE DISFRANCHISED.

There is another great objection to this amendment. It provides that after 1908 every white man of voting age who is not then able to read and write any section of the Constitution shall be disfranchised. Think of the number of boys in North Carolina to-day who are 12 years of age and under who may not be able to get an education by the time they are 21 years of age!

These boys are sure to be disfranchised and put on a plane lower than the town darkey with his eyeglasses and cocked hat. How many fathers and mothers are there in the State to-day, struggling to make both ends meet, who have managed to raise their boys until they are now 10 or 12 years of age, an age at which these boys are just beginning to help them on the farm or in the factory? In how many cases is such a boy the mainstay of a father and mother who are dependent upon his work to support the family until he is 21 years of age?

How many of these boys will reach 21 without getting an education? Yet it is this kind of a noble boy who will be called upon each year to pay taxes, to work the road, and to shoulder his musket and do the fighting if his country needs his services. This is the boy who will be expected to do the fighting and give his life for his country, while many of the politicians who are trying to disfranchise him will no doubt, like Cleveland, hire a substitute.

THE POLL-TAX-RECEIPT SCHEME.

Another objectionable feature is the provision requiring the presentation of the poll-tax receipt before voting. What does this mean? Every man in the State who is on the delinquent tax list or who has not paid his taxes as much as six months before the State election and as much as eight months before the national election will be disfranchised. How many good men are there in the State who are unfortunate or who from any reason can not pay their poll tax before the election, much less pay them six or eight months before the election?

Yet these are the men, and every one of their sons who are not more than 12 years old now, whom these politicians are trying to disfranchise under the false and specious cry of "white supremacy." A man may have paid his taxes in April, as long as five or eight months before the elections, and yet he is disfranchised at the election in August or November unless he has paid his poll tax as far back as the 1st day of March previous.

A SCHEME TO TRICK OR BRIBE VOTERS.

There is another provision in the same poll-tax section that is intended to encourage a man not to pay his taxes, so that he may be disfranchised thereby. Its purpose is to try to trick or bribe the voter into not paying his tax before the 1st day of March, so that the machine politicians may get rid of his vote. The result will be not only to cut off thousands from voting, but to also rob the State and the public school fund of tens of thousands of dollars of taxes which the public schools will lose, or which other taxpayers will be forced to make up by increased taxation. The evident purpose of this autocratic political machine is to try to restrict the suffrage of the people down to as small a number as possible, so that they may the better manipulate elections and fortify their machine in power.

Besides, there is a provision in the amendment giving to the legislature unlimited power to enact general registration laws. Under this provision the legislature can manufacture a number of hocus-pocus schemes to disfranchise voters, white and black, by preventing them from getting on the registration books. This provision in connection with section 5 is the snake in the amendment, and will enable a political machine to disfranchise white voters as well as black.

Mr. President, these are some of the many objections to this undemocratic disfranchising scheme, even if it were constitutional. And these are to my mind sufficient reasons why it is not safe to adopt such a scheme, if there were no others.

But, in the language of the New Orleans Times-Democrat, this scheme is not only unconstitutional, but it is also fraught with great danger to the white voter and to the State.

THE CHARGE OF NEGRO DOMINATION—A BASE SLANDER.

Mr. President, I have said all that I originally intended to say in discussing the resolution offered by my colleague and the proposed amendment, but the charge that has been made in this Chamber, indirectly, if not directly, that there has been negro domination in North Carolina and that it is threatened with more of it if this proposed amendment is not adopted makes it necessary for me to say something further.

No better answer is needed in reply to this unfounded and false charge than to call attention to the fact, which is a fact and which nobody will deny, that the politicians in North Carolina who have forced before the people this proposed amendment and who are to-day supporting it pledged the people on every stump in my State from mountains to sea in the last campaign that if they were put in power, they would not favor, support, or propose any suffrage scheme that would disfranchise anybody, white or black. I can prove out of the mouths of the men who are now supporting this amendment, by declarations and pledges officially made on the stump and in interviews, that the charge that there is or has been negro domination in North Carolina is unfounded and false and a base slander on the State.

If there was any negro domination in North Carolina, why was it necessary for these Democratic politicians to pledge the people, in order to get enough votes to elect them, that they were in favor of manhood suffrage and opposed to any disfranchisement of anybody? If there had been any negro domination—which neither the people of my Staten or of any other State, North or South, will permit—then the popular thing to have done to secure votes would have been the promise to the people to devise some scheme to limit suffrage as soon as they got in power. Did they do that? No. But, on the other hand, they pledged the people that they would not disfranchise a single voter in the State, white or black.

But the Senator from Mississippi, speaking on this resolution, and with an apparent effort to show that there was negro domination in North Carolina, put into the RECORD some matter from a political document to show that there has been recently a number of negroes elected to minor positions in my State, and used that as the text for the chief part of his speech. In defense of the State, and in order that the Senate and the country may know the facts, I will take the time to make a brief statement to brand that false charge.

THE FACTS.

The negro population of North Carolina comprises less than one-third of the whole population and less than one-third of the voting population. There are only 12 counties in the State in which the negro population is in a majority, while in the remaining 85 counties the white population is in an overwhelming majority. Unfortunately, a number of years ago the State supreme court, in a decision, held that under the State constitution the legislature could not give to the 85 white counties local self-government while putting the 12 negro counties under a different system.

In short, they held that the constitution required a uniform system of county government. Under that decision the legislature forced upon the 85 white counties the same kind of county government system that it seemed best to them to adopt in the 12 negro counties. Thus the people in the 85 white counties were robbed of the right and power to elect their county governing officers, but instead were forced to submit to their county governing officers being elected directly or indirectly by the legislature. This, of course, proved to be very unpopular in the 85 counties.

For many years, at every Democratic State convention, there was a contest over county government, the representatives from the 85 counties insisting that they should be allowed to elect their county governing officers and thus have direct control over their county affairs. But the State central political machine, which enjoyed the power of dictating and controlling the affairs of every county by building up local and subordinate machines at the various county seats to receive orders and do the bidding of the State machine, had, however, up to 1894, been able to force the counties of the State to submit to that odious and undemocratic system. But each year that system had grown more and more unpopular, to such an extent that it became necessary year by year to provide new methods for ballot-box stuffing, vote manipulating, and the compiling of fraudulent returns, in order to keep the majority of the people from repudiating at the polls the party organization that forced upon them such an odious machine system.

In the campaign of 1894 the revolt in the Democratic party against this machine county governing system and against the open and notorious election methods was so large that, in spite of an election law under which at least 30,000 votes were stolen, suppressed, or falsely counted, a majority of 20,000 was piled up against the Democratic party as a repudiation of the machine county government system and the fraudulent election methods. The issues in that campaign were honest elections and local self-government.

The majority of the legislature elected was composed of Republicans and Populists, who were elected on their pledge that they would establish a system of county local self-government. It was well known to the people when they voted that as long as that strange and anomalous decision of the court to which I have referred should stand that under local self-government there would necessarily be more or less negroes elected to minor positions in some of the 12 eastern counties; but there was at the same time strong hope that the supreme court would reverse that troublesome and, I might say, what seemed to be an unnecessary and an uncalled-for decision.

It was not, however, until 1897 that the supreme court reversed the county government decision and held that it was constitutional for the legislature to provide one system of county government for one county and another system for another county. This decision was so just and so in accordance with the constitution that no lawyer of any party in the State has ever criticised the court for rendering it or even questioned that it was according to the constitution. Now, this decision having been rendered, the way was perfectly clear for the 85 counties to have their local self-government and for the legislature to provide a different system for the 12 black counties, by which no negro would ever be put in a position of power or authority over white people.

Now, it is true that until this decision some negroes were elected to minor positions in these eastern counties, as everybody knew there would be until the decision of the court could be reversed, but not in a single one of these counties were the negroes in control; in not a single one were they in any position of power to dominate or dictate. Indeed, the legislature that adopted this local self-government scheme, while unable to prevent the election of any colored man to any place, yet did devise a scheme, which was constitutional, that made it impossible for the county legislative board, known as county commissioners, in any county to ever be controlled by colored men; and the fact is that no county or town or township has ever had or could have a majority of negroes on any controlling board or committee. Now, that is the "negro domination" that certain politicians have attempted to advertise to the world under false and lurid coloring.

But even that imperfection in the new system of local self-government has been removed, and who removed it? An undemocratic decision by a Democratic court made it necessary. I will not question the motives of the court in rendering the decision and in refusing to reverse it, but I will say that it was not necessary under the constitution to render such a decision, and that it resulted in building up a State political machine to control county affairs that was so undemocratic and odious that the people elected a legislature pledged to repeal it and at the same time defeat the Democratic supreme court for reelection and elected a nonpartisan supreme court. This new supreme court at the first opportunity reversed the old county government decision, and in doing so it has had the approval of the people of the State, and has not been criticised by a single lawyer, as far as I know; nor has anyone ever suggested that the decision was not in accordance with the constitution.

What has been the result? The people got the system of local self-government that they wanted, and the supreme court, by its decision, has removed the only defect to the system by reversing a former decision of the same court. The only trouble there has ever been under the system was that between the time when the legislature adopted it and the time when the decision of the court referred to was rendered. During this short period there were necessarily some negroes elected to some minor places in a few of the negro counties, as everybody knew there would be. But that condition is now and forever removed by the decision of the court.

Mr. President, when the last campaign was on, did our Democratic friends denounce this new county government system that gave to the people the control of their local affairs? No. Did they denounce the present court for the decision that removed the only defect in the system, or rather make it possible for the legislature to do it? No. Why? Because the people indorsed both and would never submit to going back to the old system.

Then what did they do? Why, they joined the People's Party and every other political party in pledging themselves to the people that they would keep that system of county government which we had established; and, in addition, they pledged themselves to enact legislation in accordance with the recent decision of the supreme court to remove the only defect in that system (under which some negroes had been elected to office) by establishing a different system of county government in the 12 negro counties referred to. This is exactly what the fusion legislature promised the people they would do as soon as the court would reverse that county government decision, and this was the only remedy offered by the Democratic party for what they called negro domination.

I repeat, every political party in the State in this last campaign made this same pledge, and that was the remedy and the only remedy offered by anybody, because it was what was necessary and all that anybody demanded.

Mr. President, so clear and patent was it to every voter in North Carolina that that remedy was all that was needed to establish forever permanent white supremacy and at the same time local self-government without disfranchising anybody, that when it was charged in the campaign that if the Democratic party got into power they would go further, and submit a disfranchising amendment, every Democratic paper and speaker in the State made haste to declare that the charge was false.

SOLEMN PLEDGES TO THE PEOPLE NOT TO DO THIS THING.

The Democratic leaders knew that if they declared in favor of disfranchising a single voter in the State, or allowed or permitted a suspicion to that effect to rest in the mind of the voter, there was no hope for them to carry the election. Realizing this, they pledged their party officially, from their State committee down to their humblest candidate, that if placed in power they would attempt nothing of the kind.

They put it officially in their handbook and declared that all their candidates, from the highest to the lowest, would make the pledge on every stump. Yes, the handbook issued by the Democratic State committee not only denounced the charge, but also declared that they were not in favor of disfranchising a single voter, white or black, and further declared for manhood suffrage and that they were in favor of upholding the fifteenth amendment in good faith, and further pointed out that as long as that amendment stood it was impossible to disfranchise a single colored man without at the same time disfranchising a white man for the same reason.

OFFICIAL PARTY PLEDGE IN THE DEMOCRATIC HANDBOOK.

In spite of that, Mr. President, the People's Party handbook made the charge that there were many leaders of the Democratic party in favor of a disfranchising amendment. The Democratic State committee thought it was necessary to reply to that charge. What did they do? They issued a second handbook, a supplement to the first handbook, in which they denounced the charge made in the People's Party handbook as false.

They went further, and said that a Democratic convention would spit upon any man who would make such a proposition. They went further, and said that the men who made the charge ought to be ashamed of themselves for willfully lying, because their whole record had shown that they would not do anything of the kind. Here is the language; it is official; it will speak for itself.

It is as follows:

The Democratic party is the poor man's party. Nine-tenths of its members are poor men. How utterly absurd, then, is the false charge that the Republicans are trumping up to deceive the unwary. In order to give some color to it, they quote something from a Yankee newspaper, whose owners and editors are, we have always understood, Republicans, that Gen. W. R. Cox, who lives in Washington, told a reporter if the Democrats succeeded they would disfranchise the ignorant negro. But General Cox publishes over his own name a declaration that he never said that and never said anything like it, for he well knew that if even the Democrats should succeed and should have control of the legislature they would be powerless to disfranchise anybody. The Constitution forbids it.

The Constitution gives the right of suffrage to all male persons over 21 years of age not disqualified by crime, and the legislature can not add or take away a letter from that. That can only be done by the people themselves, and the Democrats will never submit any proposition to the people to take from a man his right to vote. No Democrat has ever proposed such a thing. The charge is only intended to mislead, to deceive, and to make political capital. It is entirely false. There is not a Democratic convention that would not spit upon the man who might make such a proposition. There is not a Democratic candidate for office who would not pledge himself most solemnly against it.

PLEDGE BY DEMOCRATIC STATE CHAIRMAN.

Later on in the campaign, on December 27, Mr. Simmons, the Democratic State chairman, realizing that there was some doubt as to their sincerity and some suspicion that they intended to submit a disfranchising scheme, thought it necessary to issue an address. Here is his address: He not only repeats the pledges in the Democratic handbook, but he makes them even stronger and more emphatic. He declared strongly and unequivocally for manhood suffrage, white and black; that "never under any circumstances under the sun" would he or the Democratic party favor or consent to the passage of any law that would in any way lessen their present rights and privileges of voting. So solemn and positive were these pledges that not only were the white people fooled, but even thousands of negroes were made to believe that the Democratic party was their best friend; and the result was that the Democratic party in the last campaign got more negro votes than their majority at the election amounted to. Listen to the following extract from that address:

For the past twenty years or more, just before every election, the Republican speakers, at their midnight meetings, have been in the habit of telling the negro if the Democrats came into power their right to vote would be taken away from them.

First, they told them if the Democrats got the State government they would disfranchise them. The Democrats got the State government and did not disfranchise them. Then they told them if the Democrats elected a President they would disfranchise them. The Democrats elected a President and they did not disfranchise them. Then they told them if the Democrats got control of Congress they would disfranchise them. The Democrats got control of Congress and did not disfranchise them.

All along the honest white men of the State laughed at these lies, and marveled that the negro did not have sense enough to see that he was duped. Finally the negro himself began to see through the trick. He had seen the Democrats in full power in the State for twenty-two years, and had learned through experience that that party did not propose to disfranchise him, and he, too, began to laugh at these liars, and finally refused to be frightened by their rot any longer. So the old Republican scarecrow had to be hauled down and put away.

They know that the Democratic party has always stood for manhood suffrage, and they know that the Democratic party will never, under any circumstances under the sun, consent to the passage of any law which will take from them, however poor and ignorant they may be, the right to vote, or which will in any way diminish or lessen that great privilege.

Mr. President, could pledges be more direct and solemn?

PLEDGE BY THE DEMOCRATIC PRESS.

Not only this, Mr. President, but every Democratic newspaper in the State denounced the charge that their party had any such intention in most vigorous language. The following is an extract from an editorial in the Daily Wilmington Messenger of September 18, 1898, which is a sample of the editorial utterances of the Democratic press of the State on this question.

Mr. President, before reading the extract, I desire to call attention to its language. It will be noticed that the editor denounced as a liar, and used many adjectives to strengthen that word, any and every man who dared to make such a charge against the purposes of the Democratic party. He wrote a long argument to show that any attempt to disfranchise the negro voters, unless at the same time illiterate white voters were also disfranchised, would be unconstitutional and would not stand the test of the court. I read the following extract from the editorial referred to:

The most stupid lie of the campaign is the Populist lie put out by the Skinner and Thompson gang and slyly repeated by the black radicals, the bald-faced lie that if the Democrats should carry the State they would disfranchise the negroes. If they desired it ever so much, they have no power to effect it. The lie is so stupid that it could not have been started and repeated but for the profound ignorance of the niggers generally. If they knew anything, they would know that North Carolina has no power under heaven to abridge the political rights and to deprive of the privilege of voting the negroes any more than the whites. The franchise is a right secured under the Constitution of the United States, and it takes the same power to abrogate the right as to confer, to repeal a law as to make it. So it is all bosh and falsehood to try and bewilder and befool the poor, ignorant negroes in the way it has done. It is pitiful and mean to so work upon them by lying and deception. Their right to vote is as absolutely secure as the white man's right to vote.

As we stated yesterday, the three amendments to the Constitution introduced and adopted soon after the war fixed the status of the negroes as citizens equal with that of the whites in their rights. The only way to rid the country of the negro ballot is by the same means and processes that were gone through with to enfranchise him in his stolid and stupid condition. So it is a lie out of whole cloth when the dirty tricksters imposed upon the ignorant, credulous negroes by telling them that a Democratic victory means depriving them of the right to vote.

Mr. President, that editor is now contending that it is constitutional to do the very thing that he proved then would be unconstitutional. He is now freely using the words "lie" and "liar" to denounce those who question the constitutionality of section 5, and he piles up the adjectives and foams and raves when anyone calls attention to his editorials of 1898 or to the other solemn pledges made in that campaign.

PLEDGES ON THE STUMP BY DEMOCRATIC SPEAKERS.

Not only this, but every speaker put into the campaign by the Democratic State committee, so far as I can learn, made the same pledge. Hon. James H. Pou, ex-chairman of the Democratic State committee, not only made the pledge in his speeches, but he also made an affidavit to that effect. It seems that at one of his speakings some person in the audience doubted his intention and asked him if he would make an affidavit to support what he said in his speech. He agreed to make the affidavit, and he did make the affidavit, and here it is:

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA, County of Wake.

James H. Pou, being duly sworn, deposes and says:

"I have never said that if the Democrats regained control of the State they intended to disfranchise the negroes and illiterate white voters. I never have said anything like this, and I know that such is not the intention of the Democratic party. I have never heard a single Democrat give utterance to such a sentiment, and I do not believe, if such a proposition comes before the general assembly, that it would receive a single Democratic vote. I believe that a majority of the uneducated white voters of North Carolina are Democrats. The Democratic party is appealing to them for aid in preserving white supremacy in the center west and in restoring it in the eastern part of this State.

"They are responding to our appeal, and to repay them for their aid with a disfranchisement of their votes would be folly and ingratitude indeed. The men who make these charges know they speak falsely, but their campaign this year is run upon the idea that the people of North Carolina would rather believe a falsehood than the truth, and they would rather hear libels upon the honored dead than to hear arguments based upon truth.

"JAMES H. POU."

Sworn to and subscribed before me this October 1, 1898.

[SEAL.] GEO. W. THOMPSON, Notary Public.

Mr. Pou is the only speaker, so far as I know, who made an affidavit himself to try to convince his audiences that he was telling the truth when he was making these pledges. But I have on my desk a number of affidavits from voters, who testify that other Democratic speakers made on the stump the same pledge that the party organization officially made in their campaign handbook. I will read one of them:

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA, Hertford County:

A. W. Simons and Jack Everett, being duly sworn, depose and say: That they heard Hon. R. A. Daughton, one of the Democratic speakers, who was speaker in the senate of 1895 and 1895, make a speech at Harrellsville, in Hertford County, on or about October, 1898, in which Mr. Daughton denounced the charge made upon the Democratic party by Populists and Republicans, that they would pass a franchise law or a disfranchising scheme. He, Daughton, further declared and assured every voter in the audience, both white and black, that the Democratic party had no such intention and did not want to take any privileges from any voter, it made no difference how humble or how illiterate; that if the Democrats got control of North Carolina, they should have their political rights, and they would soon see that all such charges were utterly false, and that no such thing would be attempted; that the Democratic party would never attempt anything of the kind.

PLEDGES BY DEMOCRATIC CANDIDATES FOR LEGISLATURE.

Not only this, but the Democratic candidates for the legislature, from the mountains to the sea, made the solemn pledges on the stump that their State chairman said they would make. I have on my desk affidavits from voters in different counties who heard the Democratic candidates make these pledges. But it is unnecessary to read them or offer any other proof, because not one of these candidates has ever denied that he made these pledges. It has been charged on them since, and they all admit it or all keep silent.

Mr. PETTUS. I desire to ask when these pledges were made?

Mr. BUTLER. They were made during the last campaign in North Carolina when the legislature was elected which adopted this proposed constitutional amendment. Since the Senator has asked the question, I will read the affidavit that I hold in my hand. This affidavit refers to Mr. Plummer Davis, of Franklin County, a Democratic member of the legislature, who voted to submit this amendment to the people, but who pledged the people of his county that he would not do it. The affidavit is as follows:

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA, County of Franklin:

Ephraim Blacknall, being duly sworn, deposes and says that he heard Mr. Plummer Davis, Democratic candidate for the legislature in Franklin County, say publicly in the town of Louisburg that nobody need be afraid to vote for him; that if elected he would not vote to disfranchise anybody, and he would vote for no law that would be against the interest of the colored race; and, in my opinion, such promises as this was the reason why several hundred colored people in this county voted the Democratic ticket.

EPHRAIM BLACKNALL.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this the 15th day of December, 1899.

H. A. FINCH, Justice of Peace.

Mr. Davis was elected a member of the legislature. He is a member of the legislature now. When he got to the legislature he voted to submit this amendment, and is to-day supporting it, notwithstanding his solemn pledge and the pledge of his party to the contrary.

Mr. President, I will stop to read only one more of these affidavits:

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA, Cumberland County:

D. K. Taylor, being duly sworn, deposes and says that he heard H. McD. Robinson, Democratic candidate for the legislature in Cumberland County, say that the Democrats did not want the Louisiana disfranchising amendment to the constitution; that the charges made by the Republican and Populist speakers that they, the Democrats, would disfranchise the negro and poor whites was false and only used to influence their votes. They also favored the negroes controlling their own schools.

D. K. TAYLOR.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this the 27th day of January, 1900.

W. P. WEMYSS, Justice of the Peace.

Mr. Robinson, like Mr. Davis and a majority of the Democratic members, also broke his pledge when he was elected. But be it said in the honor and to the credit of a few Democratic members of the last legislature that they refused to violate their solemn pledges and to betray those who voted for them on this pledge. They defied the lash of the party machine and stood true to their pledges and to the people. They refused to vote for this proposed amendment in the legislature, and they are now openly opposing it in their counties.

PLEDGES BY DEMOCRATIC COUNTY CHAIRMEN.

Mr. President, not only did the Democratic candidates from the legislature make these pledges, but the Democratic county chairmen thought they ought to follow the State chairman, and they issued addresses and appeals to the people. I have here a sample of them. This is from Chatham County. Mr. R. H. Hayes, the county chairman, published an address to the voters of his county in which he uses as strong language as the State chairman had used in denouncing everybody who made the charge that they intended to disfranchise a single voter. I read the following from Mr. Hayes's address to the voters of Chatham County:

The most astounding charge of the Fusionists, in their desperation, is that if the Democrats win they will "disfranchise the negro and poor white man." I consider this an absolute insult to the intelligence of the whites and colored alike. In the first place, this can not be done without a change in the constitution, and this can only be done by a two-thirds vote of the people. The legislature can not do it.

One of the fusion candidates in Chatham is a lawyer, and when pressed by me at Cumnock admitted this was so, but tried to invent some other excuse. Men of Chatham, have not the Democrats had control for the last twenty years? Have they ever disfranchised one of you? Have you been denied the right to vote? If we can and wish to, could we not have done so long ago? I can not believe that any man of intelligence believes such ridiculous and absurd proposition as I am informed these people are secretly making to the negro and unlettered white man. My friends, it is an attempt to presume upon your ignorance and is an insult to your intelligence.

I read the following affidavit appended to this address certifying that what I have read is a correct copy:

R. B. Lineberry, being duly sworn, says that the foregoing is one of the circular letters addressed to the voters of Chatham and distributed in Chatham County just previous to the election in 1898, and that R. H. Hayes, a lawyer, who sent out said circular letter, was then and is now, as he is informed and believes, the chairman of the Democratic executive committee.

R. N. LINEBERRY.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 12th day of December, 1899. In witness whereof I hereunto set my hand and affix my official seal.

R. H. DIXON,

Clerk Superior Court of Chatham County.

Mr. President, I have here on my desk copies of similar addresses issued by other Democratic county chairmen to the same effect, which I will not take the time to read unless some Senator wants to hear them.

THEY HAVE BROKEN ALL OF THESE SOLEMN PLEDGES.

Now, Mr. President, this is the kind of pledges made to the voters of North Carolina in the last campaign by the politicians who are the authors of this disfranchising amendment.

No sooner had the Democratic party gotten in power by these pledges than certain party leaders began to prepare the disfranchising suffrage scheme that we have now under consideration.

I do not charge that all members of the legislature when they made those pledges on the stump knew at the time that they would keep them, for I believe that most of them when they made pledges intended to stand to them. Why? Because the record of the Democratic party in North Carolina has been for manhood suffrage, and they boasted of it on every stump. But when the legislature met a few leaders began to urge this amendment. A large number of the Democratic members of the legislature protested against it, first on the ground that they had pledged their constituents not to vote for anything of the kind, and next, on the ground that their constituents were opposed to it, and if it was submitted it would be voted down. The leaders continued to work and lay on the party lash.

At this juncture efforts were made to try to get the leaders, instead of submitting this proposed amendment, to submit another amendment, one to prohibit the colored man from holding office, but not prohibiting him or anybody else from voting. It was claimed that they had not pledged the people not to prohibit anybody from holding office. It was further claimed that that would be constitutional because the fifteenth amendment did not use the words "to hold office," but used the words "to vote."

It was also pointed out to them that no race prejudice was ever raised when the negro simply voted, because they compose only about one-third of the voters of the State, but that it was only when the negro held office or aspired to office that race prejudice and antagonism was or could be aroused.

It was further pointed out to them that the change made in the county government, putting the negro counties under a different county government system, in accordance with the recent decision of the supreme court, was sufficient to settle whatever negro question there was; and if that did not settle it, then an amendment to prohibit the negro from holding office would settle it beyond question.

They contended that it "would be going too far" to prohibit the negro from holding office. Besides, they contended that such an amendment would be unconstitutional, while at the same time they contended that section 5, which discriminated against the negro's right to vote, was constitutional.

Mr. President, these ringleaders not only refused to submit an amendment to prohibit the negro from holding office, but, on the other hand, they explicitly provided in their amendment that the negro should be eligible to hold office. It is clear from this that these politicians are carefully nursing and preserving the race issue for use in future campaigns.

I am told that there were many stormy meetings in the secret caucuses of that legislature, but the party lash was laid on from morning till night. At last, by a bare majority, as I understand, this dangerous and undemocratic measure was driven through.

But, Mr. President, while a sufficient number of the members of the legislature were whipped in by the party lash to break their pledges and pass this proposed amendment, yet I am proud to be able to say that the masses of the Democratic voters have not been whipped into line with the party lash and will not be.

THE PEOPLE WILL NOT TOLERATE SUCH TREACHERY.

There is not a more independent set of men on God's green earth than the voters in North Carolina. They have been doing their own thinking since the last election, and the result is that they have decided that section 5 is dangerous and they are going to vote against it. The Democratic leaders have discovered it, and here they rush with a new device, to be known as section 6, that they think will hoodwink these voters or satisfy them to run the risk of section 5. But the trick will not work.

Mr. President, the masses of the Democratic party in North Carolina do not indorse the treachery of their so-called leaders. They contend, and correctly, that the Democratic party in the past has always stood up for manhood suffrage and that at least they ought to be honest with the people on this question. They point to the late Senator Vance as the leader of the party for this Democratic doctrine of manhood suffrage, for which he always stood. As long as Senator Vance lived no such disfranchising scheme as this could ever be gotten through a Democratic caucus or a Democratic legislature.

ZEB VANCE DEMOCRATS AND MANHOOD SUFFRAGE.

To illustrate how the rank and file of the Democratic party in North Carolina looked upon Senator Vance as their leader, and who followed him loyally while he was alive and who revere his memory now, I will read the following interview with an old-time Zeb Vance Democrat, given in the last few days, Mr. W. H. Hargrave, ex-Democratic representative from Haywood County in the general assembly of North Carolina. He says:

I am an old-time Democrat, and there are many in my section who can boast of the same distinction. With some exceptions we are opposed to this attempt to deprive white men of their prerogative.

I fought a similar measure when I was in the legislature eleven years ago. It was introduced at a midnight caucus, and for that reason the proceedings were never printed, as I can remember. It was the warmest kind of a debate, but the measure was defeated by a small majority. Such eminent Democrats as Judge Hoke, Lieutenant-Governor Daughton, and Mr. George Jones fiercely opposed the bill as undemocratic. Zeb Vance was not present at this caucus, but was known to be in sympathy with the opposition.

No, we old-time Democrats do not intend to organize anti-amendment clubs. We are going to make a "still" fight against the proposed amendment and election law. Let me tell you, the amendments will get a big surprise when the returns from Haywood are turned in.

Now, it may be asked, How is it possible for these supporters of the amendment to hope to carry the State in the coming election in the face of the past record of the Democratic party for manhood suffrage, in the face of these false promises and broken pledges in the last campaign, and in the face of the fact that ring politicians who were the enemies of Senator Vance have captured the machinery of the party? Indeed, the man who is now Democratic State chairman was by Senator Vance defeated for confirmation in this Senate for a revenue office.

My answer is, they do not hope to carry the State; they do not hope to get a majority of the votes. They know that an overwhelming majority of the voters of the State are opposed to the amendment they have submitted and, besides, are determined to vote to repudiate them for their broken pledges and treachery.

They knew it when they submitted the amendment. Knowing this, Mr. President, they proceeded to take precautions before their legislature adjourned to provide a machinery by which they hoped to put it through. What was that? They gave long and careful attention, these leaders who forced this amendment upon the rank and file, toward framing one of the most indefensible election laws that any State has ever had upon its statute book.

THE ELECTION LAW.

They have not only given in it unlimited discretion and power to minor election officers, but they have provided that there shall be no appeal to the court from any wrong, however great. Before, we have had appeals in North Carolina to some higher body than a little election officer when the law and the constitution were violated. It is not so with the present law. The fair and just election law that we had upon the statute book when this legislature met provided that every political party in North Carolina should be represented on every election board in the State.

That fair and honest election law provided further that the parties should select their own officials to represent them and not have some other party select them for them. Is there any such provision in the present election law? If it had such a provision in it, the Democratic leaders of the State would never make a fight for this proposed constitutional amendment, for they would know it would not be worth while. They would know before they began that it would be defeated by from fifty to seventy-five thousand votes.

Instead of a fair and just provision like the one I have referred to, giving every party a representative of its own selection on all election boards and giving power to appeal to the courts when necessary to secure justice, they have adopted the machine methods of the Kentucky law, and with cunning ingenuity have devised new schemes for manipulating and miscounting votes.

I have said this much, Mr. President, to give to those interested a fair idea of the political situation now existing in the State. Under these conditions, we are preparing to vote on the proposed amendment. In spite of the election law referred to, if the people of my State are of the opinion that section 5 is unconstitutional, then the majority against it will be so great that I do not think the election law will save them to overcome it. Besides, those who do not indorse bad faith and treachery will vote to repudiate the leaders who have violated their solemn pledges to the people.

The Democratic leaders in my State realize that the more this proposition is discussed the more the voters will make up their minds that it is unconstitutional, and already that part of the press and the politicians who are supporting it are declaring that the amendment should not be further discussed, but, on the other hand, they are doing everything in their power to banish reason and to arouse prejudice and create a state of excitement.

A few days ago a prominent citizen who is opposed to this amendment gave out an interview in which he stated that he was satisfied that a majority of the white voters of the State were against the amendment and would vote against it if it could be calmly discussed upon the stump and the speeches pro and con could be put before every voter in the State.

To that end, and to make it impossible for politicians who want to appeal to race prejudice and prevent discussion from doing so, he suggested that the negro should not register or vote in the coming election, but leave the proposed amendment to be discussed and settled by the votes of the white men alone.

Would you not think that every Democratic paper and politician who has appealed and yelled for "white supremacy" and loudly objected to negroes voting at all would have gladly indorsed that suggestion to have one election in which the colored people would take no part, but stand aside and let the white people settle it? It will surprise those who think so to be told that at once the newspapers supporting the amendment began to denounce the suggestion and redoubled their efforts to stop discussion and to appeal to race prejudice.

One of the leading papers in the State supporting the amendment, published at Raleigh, as a countermove to this proposition for the negro not to take any part in the campaign, proceeded to interview a negro and got an opinion from him for publication to the effect that he did not approve of this plan.

The editor, after stating the plan, said:

> As to the success of this plan, however, there is considerable room for doubt.

And then proceeded to publish the following interview from a negro politician:

> "Do they expect us to stand idly by while our liberties are in danger?" said a negro leader and politician yesterday. "If they do, they'll be badly fooled. We'll do nothing of the sort. If we did, we'd deserve to be disfranchised. Just now the negro is dazed. He doesn't know where to turn or what to do; but, mark my words, you'll hear from him later on in the campaign."

The paper proceeds to comment on that negro politician's interview as follows:

> Whether their leaders wish it or not, the negro is going to be very much in the coming campaign.

The above is from the Raleigh News and Observer of Wednesday, January 31, 1900.

Mr. President, I submit to the Senate and to a candid public that the editor of a newspaper, claiming to be in favor of removing the negro from politics, yet who goes out to hunt up negro politicians and secures and publishes interviews from them to the effect that they are not in favor of such a plan to leave the white people alone to settle this suffrage question, is not a fit man to advise the people how to vote on such a question or on any other question.

I submit that it has the earmarks of desiring the negro question to stay in the campaigns in order to hide the real issues and to enable politicians to appeal to race prejudice instead of to argument. This is the first step to try to bring the negro into the campaign, and this from a source that is supporting this amendment. This same editor in the last campaign in my State advised negroes to become candidates for various offices in order that he might have a text from which to appeal to race prejudice. I will leave every Senator to form his own opinion of such methods and the cause that needs to be supported by such methods.

DISCUSSION WILL KILL THIS DANGEROUS AND PERFIDEOUS SCHEME.

Mr. President, this proposed amendment will be discussed in North Carolina on every stump, and before the discussion is over the people will see the flimsiness and the absurdity of the proposition of Judge Brown to instruct the court how to decide on the constitutionality of section 5 as clearly as they have already seen that section 5 was unconstitutional.

Mr. President, discussion will kill this amendment wherever it is discussed, here or elsewhere. Appeals to race prejudice, mob violence, and ballot-box stuffing are its only hope, and that the people of North Carolina will not again tolerate.

Mr. President, in conclusion, I trust I can truthfully say that I have proven by the weight of authority that section 5 of the proposed amendment is clearly unconstitutional; that I have proven by the overwhelming weight of authority and by all rules of construction ever observed by the court that section 5 would fall and that the remainder of the amendment would stand, and that the result would be that as many white voters would thereby be disfranchised as negroes; that I have proven that the proposed attempt to amend the amendment at another session of the legislature by the adoption of a provision instructing the court how to construe the amendment would be ignored by the court as not only a "dead letter," but as a piece of impertinence, and hence would be of no effect except to call the attention of the court to the fact that the legislature itself in passing the amendment doubted its constitutionality.

Mr. President, in addition to the above I have proven beyond question the fact that the legislature that submitted this proposed amendment got elected by making the most solemn pledges that they would not attempt to disfranchise anyone, white or black, if they were trusted by the people and put into power. Now, Mr. President, it would be a base slander upon the voters of North Carolina to say that they would condone and indorse such treachery, perfidy, and dishonor, to say nothing of supporting at the polls such an unconstitutional and dangerous scheme. They will not do it.

But, on the other hand, the majority against this base and fraudulent scheme and against these politicians of perfidy and dishonor will be so large that they will not be able to steal or suppress it, even under the most infamous and thieving election law that ever disgraced the statute books of any State. The voters of North Carolina, even though many of them are illiterate, are not dishonest, neither are they cowards.

Mr. President, I ask that the resolution lie on the table subject to further call.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. TURNER obtained the floor.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from Washington yield to me?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. TELLER. It is nearly 4 o'clock and the Senate is exceedingly thin. I hardly think we ought to ask the Senator from Washington, under the circumstances, to go on with his speech, unless he wishes to do so.

Mr. TURNER. My remarks would probably detain the Senate until about half past 5 o'clock; and whilst I am perfectly willing to go on if it is the pleasure of the Senate that I shall do so, I am also perfectly willing to defer my remarks until to-morrow if that will accommodate the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. I do not know whether the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations [Mr. DAVIS] does or does not desire an executive session. I suppose he does from what he heretofore said; but I do not see him present at this time.

Mr. FORAKER. I would say to the Senator from Colorado that I think it is the desire of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations to have an executive session this afternoon.

Mr. COCKRELL. There will be ample time for that. If we are not going to discuss the financial bill this afternoon, I suggest that we go to the Calendar.

Mr. FORAKER. For how long a time?

Mr. COCKRELL. For half an hour or three-quarters of an hour.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understand it will be more agreeable to the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER] to proceed to-morrow. Perhaps we had better have a short executive session and go to the Calendar afterwards.

Mr. COCKRELL. Why not go to the Calendar now?

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not object if the Senator prefers that course, but I suggest that the unfinished business may be laid aside temporarily.

Mr. FORAKER. Perhaps, in the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, that would be better.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the pending business be informally laid aside, and let us go to the Calendar.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER] to be entitled to the floor at 2 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. TURNER. With that understanding, I yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unanimous consent is asked that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

CONSIDERATION OF THE CALENDAR.

Mr. TELLER. Is the Calendar before the Senate?

Mr. COCKRELL. The Calendar is now before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not by virtue of any rule. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] asks unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of unobjected bills on the Calendar. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The first bill on the Calendar will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 602) to revive and amend an act to provide for the collection of abandoned property and the prevention of frauds in insurrectionary districts within the United States, and acts amendatory thereof.

Mr. ALDRICH. I would suggest that when the Calendar is taken up cases which have been heretofore objected to, like the one which has just been stated, should not be called.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that bill be passed over. If bills which will provoke debate have not been objected to, I object to them now.

Mr. ALDRICH. Any other course may lead to embarrassment and surprise, because there are a number of objected cases on the Calendar; otherwise we must have such bills go to the Calendar under Rule IX. If we do not do that, Senators will be obliged to stay here to object to bills like the one the title of which has just been stated, to which a number of Senators have strenuous objections. I would suggest, when the Calendar is called, as has been the custom heretofore, that we shall take up the cases subsequent to those which have been passed over under objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let Orders of Business 18 and 36 go to the other Calendar. It will not make any difference, for they can be taken up on one Calendar as well as on the other.

Mr. ALDRICH. All right; let them go to the Calendar under Rule IX.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been the custom of the Senate to commence with the consideration of bills where the last preceding case on the Calendar was left off.

Mr. ALDRICH. That has been the custom, and it has also been customary to print the Calendar with a statement showing the point which was reached when the Calendar was last under consideration. I think it would be a very good idea to have that custom continued.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next bill in order on the Calendar will be stated.

EXTENSION OF LAWS OVER PUERTO RICO.

The bill (S. 730) to extend the laws relating to commerce, navigation, and merchant seamen over the island of Puerto Rico, ceded to the United States, was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. That bill was objected to in the same way, and I object to it now. I object to all such bills. Let them go to the other Calendar.

Mr. ALDRICH. They can be taken up on vote at any time on one Calendar as well as another.

Mr. COCKRELL. If such bills are to be called every time the Calendar is taken up, I shall object to them, notwithstanding that I may be in favor of them. Let them go on the other Calendar.

THE FINANCIAL BILL.

Mr. TELLER. I want to say a word, not on the bill the title of which has been stated, but I want to be in order so as to speak when there is something before the Senate.

We have had a discussion going on for some time in the morning hour which extends so far beyond the morning hour that the financial bill has been practically shelved. The time when final action is to be taken on the bill is getting to be very short. I desire to say that I shall feel it not only my right, but my duty, to-morrow, if any Senator insists on extending his remarks beyond the morning hour, to object.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am very glad to hear the Senator from Colorado make that remark. I understand that, so far as to-morrow is concerned, by unanimous consent, the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER] has the floor at 2 o'clock, so that anything which may be under consideration before that time will have to be set aside at that hour.

Mr. ALLISON. I want to make another suggestion in reference to the financial bill; and that is that after a day or two we ought to take up the financial measure immediately on the conclusion of the routine business of the morning hour.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is right.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think that will be necessary in order to allow Senators who wish to speak an opportunity to do so.

Mr. COCKRELL. Why not begin to-morrow morning?

Mr. ALDRICH. I have no objection to having an understanding or an agreement that we take up the financial bill to-morrow morning by unanimous consent after the routine morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator make that request?

Mr. ALDRICH. I do make that request, that to-morrow morning and afterwards, until the financial bill is disposed of, it be taken up immediately after the routine morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent that the bill known as the financial bill shall be taken up immediately after the conclusion of the morning business——

Mr. ALDRICH. The routine morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. After the conclusion of the routine morning business, and taken up on all subsequent mornings——

Mr. ALDRICH. And continued from day to day until finally disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And continued from day to day until finally disposed of, to the exclusion of all other business.

Mr. CULLOM. I suppose if no Senator wants to speak on the financial bill in the morning hour of any day, we can attend to other business.

Mr. ALDRICH. That will be all right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Rhode Island as stated by the Chair? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FORAKER. I want to give notice for whatever it may be worth that as soon as the financial bill is disposed of, I shall move to take up for consideration the bill to provide a government for Puerto Rico, and for other purposes, being Senate bill 2264. I hope there will be no objection to that.

Mr. CULLOM. I trust that my colleague on the Committee on Foreign Relations and the chairman of the committee reporting the bill in reference to Puerto Rico will not interfere with the bill in relation to Hawaii.

Mr. FORAKER. I have no disposition to do so at all. On the contrary, I am equally interested in that bill.

Mr. CULLOM. I know the Senator is. I did not wish to move to take up that bill when another bill was under consideration and proceed with its consideration an hour or two one day and an hour or two two or three days thereafter. I should like to have the Hawaiian bill taken up after the financial bill shall be disposed of, and I think it will not take very long to pass it.

Mr. FORAKER. I have no doubt the Senator and I can agree upon the matter without any conflict at all, but I want the Puerto Rican bill passed also.

Mr. COCKRELL. I call for the regular order—the Calendar.

Mr. SHOUP. I observe the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. He has given notice that he would move on Wednesday to take up the question of seating Senator Quay. If that shall not be out of the way before the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Illinois move the consideration of the bills named by them, I think it would be well for them to yield until it shall have been disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the unanimous-consent agreement nothing can be taken up after the routine business each morning until the financial bill shall have been disposed of.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is right.

Mr. PETTUS. Would not unanimous consent set it aside for the time being?

Mr. SHOUP. But the motions of which notice has been given are motions to be made following the vote on the financial bill. I do not think any measure ought to interfere with the determination of the question as to whether or not Senator Quay is entitled to a seat in the Senate.

Mr. ALDRICH. The time as to which the Senator is speaking is after the 15th of February.

Mr. SHOUP. Yes.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us wait until the 15th of February comes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar is in order and the Secretary will report the next case.

CAPT. FRANCIS TUTTLE AND OTHERS.

The joint resolution (S. R. 24) recognizing the able and gallant services of Capt. Francis Tuttle, Revenue-Cutter Service, his officers and men of the Bear; also the heroic services of Lieuts. David H. Jarvis, Ellsworth P. Bertholf, and Dr. Samuel J. Call, composing the overland expedition to Point Barrow, Arctic Ocean, for the relief of imperiled whalers, was announced as next in order, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The joint resolution was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, on page 2, after line 19, to strike out the last paragraph, as follows:

That the sum of $2,500 is hereby appropriated, the same to be disbursed by the Secretary of the Treasury, for the purpose of bestowing suitable rewards upon W. T. Lopp, agent of the American Missionary Society of Cape Prince of Wales, Alaska; Artisarlook, and other natives of Alaska, for material aid and assistance rendered by them to the overland relief expedition, commanded by First Lieut. David H. Jarvis, Revenue-Cutter Service.

So as to make the bill read:

Resolved, etc., That the thanks of Congress are hereby extended to Capt. Francis Tuttle, of the Revenue-Cutter Service, and the officers and men of the revenue cutter Bear, under his command, for their able and gallant services in conveying relief to and succoring the officers and crews of the imperiled whaling fleet in the Arctic Ocean in the season of 1898.

That the thanks of Congress are hereby extended to the members of the overland expedition, landed from the revenue steamer Bear, composed of First Lieut. David H. Jarvis, Revenue-Cutter Service, commanding; Second Lieut. Ellsworth P. Bertholf, Revenue-Cutter Service, and Dr. Samuel J. Call, surgeon, for their heroic struggle of more than three months through the barren wastes of arctic Alaska, in the depths of an arctic winter, over nearly 2,000 miles of that desolate and dreary region, carrying relief and cheer to 275 distressed citizens of our country, and that in commemoration of the dauntless courage and heroic struggles of these brave men a gold medal of honor of an appropriate design, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, be awarded to each of said officers of the overland expedition.

That the sum of $500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the medals above specified.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GOVERNMENT FOR HAWAII.

The bill (S. 222) to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that be passed over. There is no need of wasting time in debating that now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

BOARDING OF VESSELS.

The bill (S. 733) concerning the boarding of vessels was announced as next in order, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, in line 4, after the word "directed," to insert "from time to time;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed from time to time to prescribe and enforce regulations governing the boarding of vessels at the seaports of the United States, and for that purpose to employ any of the officers of that Department.

SEC. 2. That each person violating such regulations shall be subject to a penalty of $100.

SEC. 3. That this act shall be construed as supplementary to section 9 of chapter 374 of the Statutes of 1882, and section 4600 of the Revised Statutes.

SEC. 4. That this act shall take effect thirty days after its passage.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ILLINOIS RIVER BRIDGE.

The bill (S. 561) extending the time for the commencement and completion of the railroad bridge across the Illinois River, near Grafton, Ill., by the St. Louis, Perry and Chicago Railroad was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the act approved May 21, 1896, granting the St. Louis, Perry and Chicago Railroad authority to construct and maintain a bridge across the Illinois River, near Grafton, in the State of Illinois, which has expired by limitation, be, and is hereby, revived and reenacted.

SEC. 2. That section 6 of the said act be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 6. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced and completed within one year from May 21, 1900."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to revive and reenact the act entitled 'An act to establish a railroad bridge across the Illinois River near Grafton, Ill.,' approved May 21, 1896."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PERFORMANCE OF EXECUTIVE FUNCTIONS.

The bill (S. 334) prohibiting the appointment or employment of Senators and Representatives to perform executive functions was announced as the next bill in order on the Calendar.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over without prejudice.

CATHOLIC CHURCH AT MACON CITY, MO.

The bill (S. 468) for the relief of the Catholic Church at Macon City, Mo., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of War to cause to be investigated the alleged use and occupation by the United States military authorities, for Government purposes, during the late war, of the Catholic Church at Macon City, in Macon County, Mo., the actual value of such use and occupation, and the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to pay the amount, if any, found to be due from the United States.

BOILERS OF THE ALVENA AND AILSA.

The bill (S. 1746) to provide for the inspection of the boilers of the Alvena and Ailsa was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a report.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Is it a long or short report?

Mr. COCKRELL. A short one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a short report.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I should like to hear it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report (submitted by Mr. PENROSE, from the Committee on Commerce, January 11, 1900), as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1746) to provide for the inspection of the boilers of the Alvena and Ailsa, have considered the same, and report as follows:

Evidence filed with the committee shows that in 1897 the wrecks of the steamers Alvena and Ailsa lay in New York Harbor, and that in April of that year the Engineer Department of the Army advertised for their removal. John W. Chittenden of New York, associated with the Merritt & Chapman Wrecking Company, was the successful bidder. During the progress of the work the engineer officer in charge decided it would be to the Government's interest to dispose of the material recovered to the highest bidder. The most valuable of the material was five boilers. The contractor's (Chittenden's) bid was the highest, and the amount of his bid for the boilers was deducted from the amount coming to him for removing the wreckage.

After purchasing the boilers and applying for their Government inspection, so that they could be used in a United States vessel, the purchaser, Chittenden, found that the United States inspectors had no authority under existing laws to make the inspection, as the boiler plates are of foreign manufacture. The present bill is to permit the inspection of these boilers to see if they are sufficiently strong and suitable to be used for United States marine purposes, to which end the usual tests will be applied, and the material will be passed only in the event that it successfully withstands all the tests, the Government being in no way committed to passing the boilers, under the language of the bill.

The Supervising Inspector-General of Steam Vessels, to whom the bill was referred, reported that he had no serious objections to the passage of the bill.

As the purchaser appears to have bought the boilers in good faith from the Government, for a valuable consideration, and as there is great need for all steamship material at the present time, your committee feels that it is justified in waiving a technical requirement of the general law, and accordingly report back the bill with the recommendation that it pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIGHTS ON STEAM PILOT VESSELS.

The bill (S. 732) relating to lights on steam pilot vessels was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, in line 14, page 2, section 3, after the word "effect," to strike out the words "on June 30, 1900," and insert "sixty days after its enactment;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That this act shall take effect sixty days after its enactment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

M. E. SAVILLE.

The bill (S. 442) for the relief of M. E. Saville was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of War to cause to be investigated an embezzlement of quartermaster and commissary funds and stores at Fort Gill, Okla., discovered while M. E. Saville, first lieutenant, Tenth Regiment United States Infantry, was quartermaster and commissary at that post, in 1896 and 1897, and if upon such examination he shall be satisfied that Saville exercised due diligence and care, he is authorized to release Saville from any further liability for the sum of $1,369.55, and to refund and pay back to Saville whatever sums may have been withheld and deducted from his pay.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHARLES STIERLIN.

The bill (S. 2281) for the relief of Charles Stierlin was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the President to revoke and set aside, so far as they relate to Charles Stierlin, certain special orders dishonorably dismissing Second Lieut. Charles Stierlin, Battery L, First Missouri Artillery, and to issue to him an honorable discharge as of date of March 16, 1864.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LOUIS MILLER.

The bill (S. 195) for the relief of Louis Miller was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of War to correct the military record of Louis Miller, late a member of the Sixty-second New York Infantry Volunteers, and to grant him an honorable discharge as of date August 4, 1862, from Company I of that regiment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ESTATE OF CHARLES M. ROBERTS, DECEASED.

The bill (S. 188) for the relief of the estate of Charles M. Roberts, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the administrator de bonis non of the estate of Charles M. Roberts, deceased, $39,034.21, in full settlement of the findings of the Court of Claims in Congressional case No. 71, House Miscellaneous Document No. 108, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.

Mr. COCKRELL. Unless some one can explain why no movement has been made against the parties who indemnified the United States I should like to have the bill passed over.

Mr. STEWART. A similar bill has passed the Senate several times.

Mr. COCKRELL. I know it, but that does not necessarily and absolutely preclude any inquiry in regard to it.

Mr. STEWART. It has been thoroughly inquired into, and there is a report here which makes it a very clear case.

Mr. COCKRELL. The report does not say anything about whether the Government has any recourse on those parties, who ought to have been required to give a bond of indemnity under the terms of the contract.

Mr. STEWART. The party is dead and the estate is good for nothing. There is no recourse on him.

Allow me one moment. A contract was to be let to put down a pavement, and Roberts, the claimant, and Cook both bid on it. Roberts bid 45 and Cook 28½ cents per square foot. Roberts had the exclusive right to lay pavements under the Schillinger patent, which afterwards went through all the courts. The Architect of the Capitol held that, inasmuch as it was cheaper and the courts had not established the validity of the patent, it would be for the interest of the United States to accept the lower bid. He took the lower bid of Cook, disregarding the patent. The court held that the patent was good. The case went to the Supreme Court, and later the matter was referred to the Court of Claims to find out what the use of the patent was worth. They found it would be worth 45 cents; that that was a reasonable bid, he being a licensee under the patent. The matter has been thoroughly adjudicated. The Supreme Court, in other cases, has held that the patent was good, and the Court of Claims have decided, the patent being good, how much the Government saved. They think it ought to pay for the use of the patent, for which the Government did not pay.

Mr. ALLISON. It is the difference between 28½ cents and 45 cents a square foot; that is all?

Mr. STEWART. Yes, sir; what would have been reasonable for the patent. I think it is a bill which ought to be passed.

Mr. COCKRELL. This is only for the amount between 28½ cents and 45 cents a square foot?

Mr. STEWART. That is all.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

UNION IRON WORKS, AT SAN FRANCISCO.

The bill (S. 1894) for the relief of the Union Iron Works, of San Francisco, Cal., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to remit to the Union Iron Works, of San Francisco, Cal., the horsepower penalty imposed under the contract for the armored coast-defense vessel Monterey, and the sum of $32,823 is appropriated for that purpose.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM T. GODWIN.

The bill (S. 395) to authorize the President to revoke the order dismissing William T. Godwin, late first lieutenant, Tenth Infantry, United States Army, and to place the said William T. Godwin on the retired list with the rank of first lieutenant, was announced as the next case in order on the Calendar.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to ask whether this is a unanimous report of the Military Affairs Committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota inquires whether this is a unanimous report.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. HARRIS], who reported the bill, is not here.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota object?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will go over without prejudice.

WILLIAM H. HUGO.

The bill (S. 792) for the relief of William H. Hugo was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the President to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint William H. Hugo a first lieutenant of cavalry in the Army of the United States, and thereupon to place him on the retired list of the Army.

Mr. SPOONER. Will a Senator who is on the committee make a statement about this bill?

Mr. PETTUS. There is a written report, but I can state the case.

This officer served through the civil war, and he served with great distinction on every occasion. He was brevetted twice, I believe. His Army record was perfect, both as a diligent soldier and as a brave man in every respect. After the war was over he served in the Indian wars and conducted himself in the same manner. He distinguished himself in every engagement in which he took part.

At the date mentioned in the bill hew as arraigned before a military court-martial. It was in time of peace, in a garrison, and he happened to be the officer appointed that evening to attend roll call, and he did attend it, but he had been to dinner and had taken too much spirits. He was tried for that, and that alone, and sentenced to be dismissed from the Army. It was the unanimous opinion of the Military Affairs Committee that that was an awful sentence for such an offense committed by such a man, and the committee were unanimously of the opinion that the bill ought to be passed.

Mr. SPOONER. How long ago was he dismissed.

Mr. HAWLEY. In 1881.

Mr. COCKRELL. This officer was in the volunteers during the civil war and afterwards was appointed in the Regular Army, and was a lieutenant in the Regular Army at the time of his dismissal. The bill simply puts him back on the retired list in that position.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SOUTH MANCHESTER, CONN., A PORT OF DELIVERY.

The bill (S. 2114) to constitute Manchester, Conn., a port of delivery was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HAWLEY. The parties in interest desire that the bill shall be amended and the word "South" inserted before the word "Manchester," more completely to carry out the purposes of the measure. That is where the chief business is done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut moves to amend the bill by prefixing the word "South" before "Manchester" wherever it occurs throughout the bill. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to constitute South Manchester, Conn., a port of delivery."

YACHT ANDRIA.

The bill (S. 2177) to extend the privileges of section 4216 of the Revised Statutes to the yacht Andria was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BENJAMIN W. LORING.

The bill (S. 281) to restore Benjamin W. Loring to the Revenue-Cutter Service was announced as next in order, and was read.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to know what the bill is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a report in the case.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I did not suppose it was necessary to have an act of Congress to secure a promotion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator object to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I shall object, unless some one explains it.

Mr. HAWLEY. There is a report from the Committee on Commerce. I know nothing of it. It was reported from the Committee on Commerce by the junior Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from South Dakota objects, it will go over without prejudice.

Mr. HAWLEY. Does the Senator from South Dakota want to have the report read?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over without prejudice.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the bills which have been passed over will be placed as heretofore, and that on the next call of the Calendar it will begin at the point which has just been reached, so that those which have been passed over will not be called.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That direction has been given to the clerks at the desk. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 7, 1900, at 12 o'clock m.

THE SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE:

In making arrangements for the funeral of the late General Lawton, which is to take place at the Church of the Covenant next Friday at 2 o'clock, seats have been reserved for the Military Committee of the two Houses of Congress, also the Indiana delegation in Congress. I desire to inform you, and through you the members of the body over which you preside, that seats will also be reserved for all individual Senators and Members who shall before Thursday noon notify the Adjutant-General of the Army of their desire to be present. The suggestion as to Senators and Members applies to the officers of the Senate and House.

ELIHU ROOT, Secretary of War.

COMMUTATION TO PETTY NAVAL OFFICERS.

Mr. TATE. I ask unanimous consent to take from the table and put upon its passage the bill (S. 2727) authorizing payment of commutation of ration to the petty officers of the Navy who served on detached duty between March 1, 1898, and November 4, 1899.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the petty officers of the Navy who served on detached duty between March 1, 1898, and November 4, 1899, be, and hereby are, allowed commutation of ration for the time they so served.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PAYNE. I should like to hear the report read.

The report of the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs (by Mr. HALE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2727) authorizing payment of commutation of ration to the petty officers of the Navy who served on detached duty between March 1, 1898, and November 4, 1899, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report it back favorably and recommend that it do pass.

The committee append the views of the Navy Department upon the measure, as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, January 25, 1900.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith the draft of a bill authorizing payment of commutation of ration to the petty officers of the Navy who served on detached duty between March 1, 1898, and November 4, 1899, and to recommend the same to the favorable consideration of the committee.

There are a number of petty officers, among whom are 25 yeomen employed in the Navy Department, who served from one-half month to nineteen months on detached duty and were allowed to commute their ration.

The accounting officers of the Treasury have held that under the decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury of October 19, 1898, the provisions of the act of January 31, 1895, that "all enlisted men and boys in the Navy attached to any United States vessel or station and doing duty thereon, and naval cadets, shall be allowed a ration, or commutation thereof in money, under such limitations and regulations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe," do not include these men, the places where they were employed not being "stations" in a military sense, and, they having been paid the amount of the commuted ration, checkages of from $4.50 to $175 have been directed against their accounts. The pay of these men has been small, and they are not in such circumstances that their accounts may be checked without injury to themselves and those dependent upon them, and in some cases they would be left in straitened circumstances.

It was understood at the time of enlistment that these men would be entitled to commutation and ration, and the Department has received the services of some who otherwise would have been unwilling to enlist. In view of the ruling of the accounting officers, on November 4 last, the pay of petty officers serving on detached duty was, by Executive order, increased $9 per month, in lieu of the ration allowed in the Navy.

A second draft, placing the proposed measure in form suitable for insertion in the appropriation bill, is also inclosed for the convenience of the committee, should that form be preferred.

Very respectfully, JOHN D. LONG, Secretary.

HON. EUGENE HALE,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs,
United States Senate.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TATE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection, House bill 7661, similar in its provisions to the bill just passed, will be laid on the table.

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. Mr. Speaker, on Friday and Saturday last I submitted some remarks upon matters pertinent to the Indian appropriation bill, which was then under consideration. Leave to print has been given, but it is limited to five days. In consequence of absence from the city it will be impossible for me to file my remarks within the time specified. I ask unanimous consent, therefore, to extend my remarks in the RECORD without regard to the limitation of time fixed by the House.

There was no objection.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. CANNON. I rise to make a privileged report—the report of a committee of conference—and I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the report be dispensed with and that only the statement of the House conferees be read.

There was no objection.

The conference report (which was not read) is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate numbered 5 and 26 to the bill (H. R. 6237) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for prior years, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 26, and agree to the same.

J. G. CANNON,
L. F. LIVINGSTON,
Managers on the part of the House.
W. B. ALLISON,
H. M. TELLER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the House conferees was read, as follows:

The managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate numbered 26, appropriating $5,000 to enable the Naval Observatory to observe the approaching total eclipse of the sun, submit that the action recommended in the accompanying conference report will result in the House agreeing to said amendment and making the said appropriation.

J. G. CANNON,
L. F. LIVINGSTON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, a single word about this report. This is the urgent deficiency bill. The House made an amendment to the Senate amendment; and as to one item the Senate agrees; and the House by this report recedes from its disagreement to the other item. I am satisfied that from the standpoint of the public service the matter agreed to ought not to be appropriated for. It carries $5,000 for observing the total eclipse of the sun. There is another item in the bill, which was the proper item and was agreed to, making an appropriation for observing the total eclipse of the sun under the authority of the Smithsonian Institution. This is an additional appropriation to enable the Naval Observatory to make the same observations.

As the Senate insists, your committee did not feel justified in further holding out against the insistence of the Senate. This bill makes available between fifty and sixty million dollars for the public service where it is needed and which can not wait longer.

If this matter had stood by itself, your committee would not have agreed to this item. And I may say right here for the information of the House that the scientific work and much of the engineering work and topographical work of this Government is in a pretty bad condition, so far as the public service is concerned. The work is being duplicated in many departments.

The sum of money now in question is small—only $5,000. But it is money appropriated for no practical use, because one corps of surveyors and one corps of observers will be quite sufficient.

We have here a provision for doing this work under the Naval Observatory. Strange to say, this work is to be done under the command of the Navy, and generally under the command of an officer of the Government who does not know anything more about astronomy than some of us do about heaven; and that is not much.

But here we have two separate machines, two separate organizations. If one is left out, that organization is inclined to pout; and the sisters, the cousins, and the aunts of the employees besiege members in regard to the matter. And so you go.

I make this remark for the information of the House—that somebody, the House or the Senate, or both, can perform much good work if we could bring this scientific work necessary to be done in the various bureaus and departments under one management and stop duplicating the work. There is in this round earth of ours quite enough to be done for the service of any government without having two sets of people doing it.

I now move the adoption of the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL FOLDERS.

Mr. JOY. I desire to submit a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts.

The Clerk read the following resolution, introduced December 7, 1899, by Mr. BULL:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House be, and is hereby, authorized to employ fifteen additional folders in the folding room of the House, at a compensation at the rate of $75 each per month, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House: Provided, That such employees shall be dropped from the rolls of the Doorkeeper at a period not later than one month from the expiration of the present session of Congress.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 1 strike out "fifteen" and insert "fourteen;" so as to provide for 14 additional folders.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri whether this is not earlier in the session than this resolution usually comes in?

Mr. JOY. It is not. It usually comes in in January or February; and I will say this year the documents to be sent out have come in a great deal earlier than usual. Within a week after the currency bill was disposed of there were 300,000 documents to be sent out. This resolution proposes to allow the same number of folders usually allowed in a Presidential year.

Mr. BARTLETT. One less.

Mr. JOY. One less in this resolution; but there is another resolution providing for the assistant foreman. It is in effect the same number as we usually allow.

The amendment recommended by the Committee on Accounts was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

ASSISTANT FOREMAN OF FOLDING ROOM.

Mr. JOY. I present another resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House be, and is hereby, authorized to appoint P. L. Coultry, the acting assistant foreman of the folding room during the Fifty-fifth Congress, as assistant foreman of same from December 3, 1899, to June 30, 1901, inclusive; and for such service be paid by the Clerk of the House out of the contingent fund of the House until otherwise provided for, at rate of $3.85 per day.

With the following amendment recommended by the Committee on Accounts:

In line 4 strike out the words "June 30" and insert in lieu thereof the words "March 4."

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

MILITARY HOSPITAL, FORT LEAVENWORTH, KANS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 6) authorizing the Secretary of War to use $60,000 of the appropriations for the support of the Regular and Volunteer Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, for the construction of a modern military hospital at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., with Senate amendments thereto.

The Senate amendments were read, as follows:

Line 4, insert ", or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Lines 6 and 7, strike out "mentioned in said act, or so much thereof as may be necessary" and insert "by the act making appropriations for the support of the Regular and Volunteer Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, approved March 3, 1899."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendments.

Mr. CANNON. I want to know what these amendments do. What is the effect of them?

Mr. HULL. They do not change the amount at all; they simply make it clear that it comes out of that appropriation, and after the words "sixty thousand dollars" it inserts the words "or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. CANNON. The limit of cost is $60,000?

Mr. HULL. Sixty thousand dollars.

The Senate amendments were concurred in.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 899. An act granting an increase of pension to Mary A. Dennis—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 2354. An act enlarging the powers of the Choctaw, Oklahoma and Gulf Railroad Company—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of appropriation bills, with a view to taking up the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill.

Before that motion is put, I ask my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE], if we can not make some arrangements as to a limitation of debate.

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Speaker, several gentlemen on this side are anxious to speak, three or four in addition to those who have already spoken, and I should be very glad to make provision for them, if I can do so, by agreement with the gentleman.

Mr. HITT. About how much time does the gentleman desire in addition to what he has consumed?

Mr. DINSMORE. I have requests for at least two hours and a half.

Mr. HITT. If we can limit the debate, then, say, to 5 o'clock to-day——

Mr. DINSMORE. I will consent to that.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will ask the gentleman from Arkansas whether that includes the time that I have asked him for?

Mr. DINSMORE. Yes; I have made provision for the gentleman from Colorado in that time.

Mr. HITT. If the general debate is to run until 5 o'clock to-day, we might as well let the vote go over until to-morrow.

Mr. DINSMORE. Yes; I think that would be best.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, after consulting with my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE], I ask the Chair to state the agreement between us—that to-day be devoted to general debate, as on yesterday, and that, having concluded the general debate to-day, we may proceed with the consideration of the bill by paragraphs to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent is asked by the gentleman from Illinois that general debate be concluded to-day. Is there objection?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I should like to ask the gentleman from Illinois what proportion of time has been consumed upon this side and on the other?

Mr. HITT. Forty minutes have been consumed upon this side and three hours upon the other.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. It seems to me that the time ought to be more evenly divided, if there is any disposition upon this side to debate the bill.

Mr. HITT. I consulted the wishes of gentlemen on this side who wished to speak yesterday, and all those who wished to speak on this side yesterday had the opportunity to do so.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I simply desire to say that, as a member of the committee, I may wish to consume some time in the general debate, and I should like the opportunity of doing so if I desire.

Mr. HITT. The gentleman had the opportunity on yesterday, and he will have it again to-day if he will mention it.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I understand I can have the time then, if I need it.

Mr. HITT. I will make liberal arrangement for the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

And then, on motion of Mr. HITT, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7941) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, with Mr. SHERMAN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. General debate on this bill, as the Chair understands it, is limited to 5 o'clock.

Mr. HITT. The understanding was reached on yesterday, and is confirmed again to-day, that the time is to be controlled on the one side by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE] and on the other by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate to be equally divided?

Mr. HITT. The time for debate is to be equally divided between the two sides of the House.

Mr. DINSMORE. That was the understanding, Mr. Chairman; that is correct; but it presents this embarrassment——

Mr. HITT. It was so stated.

Mr. DINSMORE. But in coming to this agreement, understanding that there was a lack of disposition on the majority side of the House to avail themselves of all the time, I stated that I thought there would be opportunity for gentlemen on this side of the House who desired to speak if we closed the general debate to-day. The gentleman from Illinois will at once see that if one-half of the entire time is taken up on the majority side it would not leave us sufficient time here.

The CHAIRMAN. The agreement reached in the House, as the Chair understands it, was that general debate be closed to-day, and in furtherance of the agreement reached yesterday, that the time be equally divided, to be controlled alike by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE], and that disregards the time that was occupied yesterday.

Mr. DINSMORE. My understanding at the time——

Mr. HITT. That would include both days; but I will state to the gentleman from Arkansas that so far as I know we do not expect to occupy all our time, and I shall yield to the gentleman for his side of the House all the time that is not asked for by friends here.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] desire to occupy some of his time now?

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GIBSON] one hour.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to take advantage of this opportunity to discuss the question of expansion from a national standpoint; to show the various expansions in the history of our country from the very beginning. It might be stated generally that we began as a people to expand from the moment that the feet of our ancestors first landed upon the shores of the Atlantic coast of North America, and from that day to this we have been extending the area of our possessions and our influence until they have reached their present extraordinary limits.

Ordinarily the Louisiana acquisition is considered our first expansion; and it was our first expansion from what might be termed a national standpoint. But it was not our first expansion as a people. In 1753 the whole of the Mississippi Valley, as well that on the west side of the river as that upon the east side, belonged to France. That vast domain reaching from the Allegheny Mountains on the east to the Rocky Mountains on the west was in the undisputed possession of France. The territory now occupied by the States of Mississippi and Alabama was a part of the territory of France. What is now Tennessee and Kentucky and West Virginia was a part of the territory of France. Western Pennsylvania and all of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin were all carved out of what once was a part of the territory of France.

FRENCH POSSESSIONS IN NORTH AMERICA.

As stated by Bancroft in his History of the United States, in 1753 France owned twenty twenty-fifths of the whole of North America, Spain owned four twenty-fifths, and England owned only one twenty-fifth. In 1753 the area of the original thirteen colonies was only 358,000 square miles, not as large as the State of Texas when annexed; and they were inhabited by only 1,165,000 white people, none of whom lived west of the Allegheny Mountains. In 1753 France owned the whole of that immense area reaching from the Allegheny Mountains on the east to the Rocky Mountains on the west, and no other nation disputed her sovereignty or her possession. But the spirit of expansion, the thirst of enterprise, and the love of adventure that have animated our race from the dawn of its history, and that first brought our ancestors from the Baltic Sea to Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, then to the north of France, then from those regions to England, and then from England to America, where they laid the foundations of their final empire, were still inspiring the hearts, energizing the intellects, and propelling the footsteps of our ancestors. To roam, to explore, to occupy, and to build was their nature. The Almighty had made them so. This decree He had written in their souls, and it was a part of their very life.

Hitherto this new and vigorous and wonderful race had crossed seas and bays and oceans, but had never yet crossed mountains. The Alleghenies barred their way to the West. On the other side was the yet unconquered red man. On the other side was the sovereignty of the great Kingdom of France. On the other side were boundless forests, unexplored wildernesses, unnavigated rivers, and unmeasured prairies.

These formidable obstacles, obstacles that heretofore in the history of the world had been sufficient to divide people from people, race from race, and nation from nation, were no obstacles at all to the descendants of those mighty adventurers that had breasted the tempests and buffeted the billows in order to lay the foundations of their future empire on the continent of North America.

WASHINGTON THE FIRST AMERICAN LEADER OF EXPANSION.

And so our ancestors began to cross the Allegheny Mountains. The French resisted, and who was chosen to overcome that resistance? It was George Washington. George Washington it was who led the first army of American expansion. George Washington it was who fought the first battle in the first war of American expansion. And George Washington it was who won the first victory ever won in battle for American expansion.

Then came on the great French and Indian war, which raged from 1754 to 1763, the Indians and the French on the one side and the British and the Americans on the other side; a war whose line of battle was a thousand miles, reaching from the Plains of Abraham in Upper Canada to Fort Loudon in what is now East Tennessee, a war waged by land and sea, a war waged by cannon and rifle, by tomahawk and scalping knife, a war whose zone of conflict was illuminated by the blazing homes of hundreds of the inhabitants of the frontiers and made hideous by the warwhoops of painted savages and the fearful cracks of the deadly rifle.

The people of the American colonies never looked backward. Looking backward is not one of the characteristics of our race. We have not only always looked forward, but have looked far forward.

In June, 1754, the representatives of the American colonies met in convention at Albany, N. Y., and agreed to unite in making defense against the French and Indians, and in an effort to drive them out of the country west of the Allegheny Mountains.

Mr. Chairman, that was a great day in American history, for then and there we began to be one people; and from that day down to the present, amid many trials, many discords, many vicissitudes, many perplexities, and many dangers, have continued to be one people. And hence it is I call this great war the first war of expansion ever entered on by the American people.

OUR FIRST GREAT WAR OF EXPANSION.

The American people, as I have already stated, then numbered 1,165,000. Bryant, in his history of the United States, says that during this war the Americans "lost nearly 30,000 of their young men," which was one out of every six men capable of bearing arms. And hundreds of women and children were massacred, the victims of the tomahawk and the scalping knife of the merciless Indian savages.

That, Mr. Chairman, was war. There were no faint hearts in that war. There was nothing said about the rights of the French and the Indians; nothing said about "the consent of the governed." No, Mr. Chairman, nations do not move forward in that way. The children of Israel did not ask the "consent" of the Canaanites to take possession of their country. The army of Joshua did not ask the consent of anybody when they crossed the Jordan and planted the ark of the covenant in the land of Canaan. The earth is the Lord's, and the people of the earth are but His tenants, and tenants at will, and He gave us this land to be our inheritance.

This great war between the Americans and British on the one side and the French and Indians on the other resulted in the overthrow of the armies of France, and the ten years' war was brought to a close by France surrendering all the territory east of the Mississippi and all of what is now Canada. By this surrender there was added to the domain of the American colonies 530,000 square miles, now occupied by the great States of Mississippi, Alabama, Tennessee, Kentucky, West Virginia, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin, and by the western part of Pennsylvania.

This was our first great expansion—530,000 square miles of the choicest land to be found to-day anywhere beneath the bright sun.

OREGON OUR SECOND EXPANSION.

Exactly what territory was our second expansion may be a matter of dispute. Captain Gray, in 1792, discovered the mouth of the Columbia River and sailed up that river and laid claim to the unknown country of Oregon in the name of the United States of America, and that has always been the foundation of our claim to the Oregon country—its discovery by Captain Gray in 1792. Oregon is no part of our Louisiana purchase, and the maps of the United States, now issued by the Land Office, show upon their face that Oregon was no part of the territory we purchased from France in 1803. Our title to Oregon depends, first, upon the discovery of the mouth of the Columbia River by Captain Gray in 1792. It is a law of nations that any country that discovers and occupies the mouth of a river thereby becomes entitled to all the unoccupied territory watered by that river. It was on that doctrine of international law that France laid claim to the whole valley of the Mississippi between the Rocky Mountains and the Alleghanies, and it was in accordance with this law that we based our claim to all the territory watered by the Columbia River.

The next ground of our title to Oregon was the treaty of 1819 with Spain, whereby Spain, at the time she ceded Florida to the United States, quitclaimed to the United States all of that territory north of what was then called Upper California, now occupied by the States of Oregon, Washington, and Idaho. And it is upon those two acts, one of discovery by Captain Gray and the other of quitclaim by Spain, that we base our title to the territory of Oregon. And so Oregon is our second acquisition. The whole territory aggregates 299,000 square miles.

LOUISIANA OUR THIRD EXPANSION.

I now come to the Louisiana purchase, in 1803, whereby for a consideration of $15,000,000 we acquired from France that great territory reaching from Canada down to the Gulf of Mexico, and lying between the Mississippi River upon the east and the Rocky Mountains on the west, including Texas, for I will show in the course of my remarks to-day that Texas was a part of the Louisiana purchase, and that in 1819, when we acquired Florida, President Monroe and the American Government turned over Texas and the Americans in it to Spain as part of the purchase price.

Mr. Chairman, the average man who has not investigated this question often thinks, in consequence of confusion of names, that the Louisiana we acquired from France in 1803 is merely the present State of Louisiana; but that is far from the truth. The Louisiana that we purchased from France contained, leaving out Texas, 883,000 square miles, and including Texas contained 1,260,000 square miles. Out of the Louisiana purchase have been carved the States of Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, Iowa, Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, Wyoming, Nebraska, Kansas, and Colorado, and the Territory of Oklahoma and the Indian Territory, all carved out of this magnificent domain acquired by Thomas Jefferson in 1803, at the price of $15,000,000.

Our next acquisition was Florida, which we purchased from Spain in 1819, the treaty being finally consummated in 1821, when the country was turned over to us; and for Florida we contracted to pay Spain $5,000,000, although as matter of fact the actual cost was $6,500,000. By that acquisition we acquired 70,000 square miles of territory.

TEXAS OUR FIFTH EXPANSION.

Our fifth acquisition or expansion was Texas, which we acquired in 1845 by agreement between the then independent Republic of Texas and the United States of America, the agreement upon our part having been consummated by joint resolution passed by the two Houses of Congress. In that day, as in this, there were men in the Congress of the United States fighting the further expansion of our country, and good men at that—wise men and patriotic men. Even so good and great a man as Daniel Webster opposed the acquisition of Texas. Henry Clay opposed the acquisition of Texas, although in 1819, when in acquiring Florida we sold Texas to Spain, and sold many Americans in the bargain, Henry Clay then protested against the sale, declaring that Texas was worth five times what Florida was worth. In 1819 Andrew Jackson favored the transfer of Texas to Spain. President Monroe himself said that our claim to Texas was as good as our claim to New Orleans, and President Tyler, in his message to Congress in reference to the annexation of Texas, said that we were then reclaiming a territory that we had once transferred to another country.

By the annexation of Texas we acquired 377,000 square miles of territory.

Mr. GAINES. Before the gentleman leaves the question of the Louisiana purchase, I hope he will explain that in the treaty making that purchase it was expressly provided that the Territory should be made into States of the Union; and that is not even contemplated, as I understand, either by the treaty with Spain or by Congress with reference to the Philippine Islands or Puerto Rico.

Mr. GIBSON. I will bring all that in at the right place.

Mr. TERRY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question right there. Does he think there is any analogy——

Mr. GIBSON. I will come to the analogies after a while. I hope gentlemen will wait.

Mr. TERRY. I should like to have the gentleman now——

Mr. GIBSON. No; it does not fit in with my argument. I am going to show that the objections that were made to the acquisition of Louisiana, and the objections that were made to the acquisition of Texas and to the acquisition of California were exactly the same objections that you gentlemen are now urging in this House against any further extension of American sovereignty—the very same. But do not be so tender under the saddle.

Mr. TERRY. We are not at all tender; but you must be a little tender when you will not permit any interruption at this point.

Mr. GIBSON. It will be no interruption when I get to the right place; but gentlemen must not get too touchy. I have hardly made any motion yet in the direction in which you want me to proceed. I know that a horse with a tender back will flinch as soon as you put in an appearance. But the time for gentlemen on the other side to flinch will come a little later.

CALIFORNIA OUR SIXTH EXPANSION.

Our sixth acquisition was in 1848, when we acquired California. By that acquisition we obtained 523,000 square miles of territory, for which we paid thousands of lives and hundreds of millions of treasure in prosecuting the war and $15,000,000 in hard cash to boot.

Our seventh acquisition was Arizona, made in 1853, whereby we acquired 46,000 square miles of country, sometimes called "the Gadsden purchase;" and for that Gadsden purchase we paid $10,000,000. Anybody who has ever traveled over the territory embraced within that Gadsden purchase knows that it will not sprout any sort of seed that has ever been discovered, unless it be seed ticks, or some other vermin. [Laughter.] Prairie dogs, gophers, coyotes, and rattlesnakes are about the only sort of animals you will find in the Gadsden purchase, for which we paid $10,000,000 in 1853; but that was all right, because it was done under a Democratic Administration.

Our eighth acquisition was Alaska, acquired in 1867, containing 577,000 square miles of territory, for which we paid $7,200,000.

Our ninth acquisition was the Hawaiian Islands, acquired in 1898, in the same manner that we acquired Texas. The parallel between the two cases is absolutely perfect. They are on all fours and fit at every corner. In the case of Hawaii, as in the case of Texas, the Senate of the United States failed to ratify the treaty, and the annexation was finally brought about by joint resolution passed by a majority of each House of Congress.

The government of Texas was revolutionary, just as the government of the Hawaiian Islands was revolutionary, when the acquisition by joint resolution was consummated. By the Hawaiian acquisition we obtained 6,000 square miles of territory.

PUERTO RICO AND THE PHILIPPINES OUR TENTH EXPANSION.

Our tenth acquisition was Puerto Rico and the Philippine Islands, acquired as a result of the treaty with Spain ratified last year; and by that treaty we acquired 120,000 square miles of territory, thus bringing up the area of our national domain from 358,000 square miles to 3,789,000 square miles—all as the result of expansion; for, be it remembered, when our ancestors first landed on the shores of North America they did not own one foot of the soil.

And I will say here now, Mr. Chairman, that expansion is a part of our national life. We are expansionists by destiny and by heredity. The progressive men, the aggressive men, the enterprising men, the adventurous men of every generation have moved still farther west. From the Atlantic coast they moved westward until they reached the Blue Ridge Mountains; then they crossed the Blue Ridge and went westward until they struck the Allegheny Mountains. The most adventurous of that generation crossed those mountains, going down into Tennessee and Kentucky and western Virginia and western Pennsylvania and Ohio; and the most adventurous inhabitants of those States continued to go west, until the Mississippi River was reached, ever following the setting sun, as though anxious to discover his resting place.

When the banks of the Mississippi River were reached, many of the people of the United States believed that we had reached our "Ultima Thule." They believed that the Mississippi was the "Ne Plus Ultra" of American territory; and that if we went farther we would travel the rugged road of danger; and in both branches of Congress at that time, both in the House of Representatives and in the Senate of the United States, there were men who rose up and protested that the acquisition of the territory west of the Mississippi River would result in the ultimate destruction of the country, and was so violative of the provisions of our Constitution that it amounted in itself to a dissolution or abandonment of the Union, and relegated all of the original States to their rights prior to the formation of the Constitution.

PREDICTIONS OF EVIL AND DANGER.

But gloomy forebodings and warnings of danger and predictions of disaster failed to deter the adventurous American expansionists. The heredity of expansion was in their heels and in their hands and in their heads and in their hearts, and no danger could alarm them, no difficulty deter them, no obstacle stop them. The sons of the pioneers of Tennessee, Kentucky, Alabama, and the great West moved down into Texas, rebelled against Mexico, raised the banner of independence, and finally annexed Texas to the United States. This brought on a war with Mexico, during which we acquired Upper California, and thereby more firmly planted ourselves on the shores of the Pacific Ocean.

Then it did seem that we had indeed reached the Ultima Thule of territorial expansion; that here on the shores of the mighty Pacific we were to set up the pillars of the god Terminus, on which should be inscribed the words "Ne Plus Ultra;" that there was no further beyond for the sovereignty of the great American Republic. But those who adopted that view, like those who fixed bounds for us previously, found themselves mistaken.

Mr. Chairman, when Columbus discovered America all the English-speaking people on the face of the earth numbered only 4,000,000 and occupied but 51,000 square miles of territory. How many are we to-day? One hundred and forty-three million. And we possess 15,000,000 square miles of territory, two-fifths of the whole habitable globe, and we are still expanding! This mighty and irresistible wave of expansion, that started from the Baltic Sea about two thousand years ago, is spreading, ever spreading, and will continue to spread until it rolls over every sea and washes every shore in all the world. The progress of our race can never be stayed. You can never fix its bounds. No one continent can suffice it. No one ocean can satisfy it. No one zone can contain it. No one hemisphere can circumscribe its powers and its activities.

EXPANSION OUR DESTINY.

The world is its arena, and the limits of the world its only boundary. Its destiny is to dominate the entire face of the earth, including all races and all countries and all lands and all continents, in all latitudes, under every sky; and wherever we go we carry blessings in our hands; from the folds of our flag are shaken out the bright rays of liberty, and out of our mouths will proceed the gospel of a higher civilization, a better religion, and a grander life.

Here the free spirit of mankind, at length,
Throws its last fetters off; and who shall place
A limit to the giant's unchained strength,
Or curb his swiftness in the forward race?

I am one of those, Mr. Chairman, who believe that the race we belong to—I care not whether you call it German or whether you call it Saxon or Anglo-Saxon, or whether you call it American—I believe that the race we belong to, the race that came from the Baltic Sea—call it Norwegian, Swede, or Dane if you will—that Viking race that came from the Baltic Sea, one branch of it coming toward the west and the north, peopling Denmark, Sweden, Norway, Holland, France, and the British Islands, and thence across the Atlantic to America: and the other branch going into Russia, establishing itself in that country and giving to it its name and its inspiration—yes, these same Northmen, who, finding the Baltic Sea open to the west, sailed thence across two oceans around the world, finding this same sea closed on the east by the greatest unbroken stretch of land in the Old World, with a sublime faith in their destiny and the universality of their empire, boldly took possession of its shores and undertook the gigantic and seemingly impossible task of reaching the sea by a conquering march of 6,000 miles across two continents, and now behold them on the shores of China, launching their ships on the Pacific Ocean and saluting their American kinsmen at the other end of the earth!

THE RUSSIAN EXPANSIONISTS OUR KINSMEN.

The Northmen, ordinarily under the name of Varangians, not only gave Russia her name but her start as the ruling power in northeastern Europe and northern Asia; and when Russia finally reached the Pacific through the Gulf of Pechili, one of her Varangian dreams was realized, and once more the Russian sea kings could launch their ships upon the unbounded sea.

In the Gulf of Pechili the descendants of those Northmen who sailed west out of the Baltic met the descendants of their brother Northmen who marched eastward from the Baltic, and when they shook hands their dominion girdled the globe and their conquest of the whole earth was assured. I say, Mr. Chairman, I am one of those who believe that this race can never be confined to any quarters, however large. It despises barriers, ignores limits, and rebels against boundaries. For it there is no Rubicon, no Pillars of Hercules, no impassable Alps, no unnavigable sea, no impenetrable desert, no intolerable climate.

This race, Mr. Chairman, born of what divine parents we know not, cradled in the Baltic Sea thousands of years ago, baptized with what baptism of glory we know not, the gospel of human liberty breathed into its nostrils as the breath of its life, and the badge of empire imprinted on its brow, it went forth commissioned to subdue and conquer the earth and to have dominion over every living thing.

You may as well try to dam the floods of the Mississippi with ropes of sand, or to stay the mighty currents of the ocean with bags of chips, or stop the planets in their courses with cobwebs, as to try to stay the irresistible and all-conquering progress of that spirit of national expansion that has animated our race for the last thousand years. Like the "eternal spirit of the chainless mind," no dungeon can confine it, no whip can subdue it, no difficulty can discourage it, no obstacle can stay it, no power can conquer it, for God is its father and victory is its destiny. It is the master heredity of our master race.

OUR RACE HAS A MISSION.

Mr. Chairman, our race has a mission. No devout student of history can misread it. We are the preachers of a new evangel of government; we are the missionaries of a new and higher civilization; we are the apostles of the New World to the Old, and a part of our mission is to evangelize Asia and the Islands of the Sea.

The Genius of this New World, standing like an Archangel on the highest mountain on our Pacific coast, might well use that grand poetic and prophetic chant of Walt Whitman, uttered many years ago:

I chant the world on my Western sea,
I chant copious the islands beyond, thick as stars in the sky,
I chant the new empire grander than any before, as in a vision it comes to me.
I chant America, the mistress, I chant a greater supremacy,
I chant projected a thousand blooming cities yet in time on those groups of sea islands,
My sail ships and steamships threading the archipelagoes,
My Stars and Stripes fluttering in the wind,
Commerce opening, the sleep of ages having done its work, races reborn, refresh'd,
Lives, works resumed—the object I know not—but the old, the Asiatic renewed as it must be,
Commencing from this day surrounded by the world.

* * * * * * *

The sign is reversing, the orb is inclosed.
The ring is circled, the journey is done.

Mr. Chairman, the Philippine Islands have been lawfully and constitutionally acquired. The President made the treaty of acquisition, the Senate ratified it, and the House of Representatives voted the money to pay for them, and voted 65,000 soldiers to hold them.

And yet some complain of the President because he is obeying the orders of Congress and the mandates of the Constitution. If the President were to surrender these islands or pause a moment in the enforcement of our sovereignty there, he would be guilty of an impeachable offense and would violate his oath of office.

OUR POLICY IN THE PHILIPPINES.

In prosecuting the war in the Philippines the President is not only doing his duty under the Constitution and laws of the land, but he is doing what a large majority of this Congress and a large majority of the American people desire him to do; and in his every act has shown himself not only a great President and patriotic American but a magnificent specimen of the true type of that grand race to which we belong.

My individual views on the Philippine question are contained in these resolutions, which I introduced in this House December 10, 1899:

Concurrent resolutions relative to the views and purposes of Congress as to the Philippine Islands.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Philippine Islands are, and ever since the ratification of the late treaty with Spain have been, the exclusive and absolute property of the United States; and that it is, and ever since said ratification has been, the constitutional duty of the President to maintain the sovereignty of the United States over said islands and to effectually suppress all insurrections against said sovereignty and other disturbances of the public peace in said islands; and that we hereby ratify and approve all that the President has done to maintain our authority and restore order in said islands.

SEC. 2. That as soon as the supremacy of the United States shall have been fully established in said islands Congress will provide for them such a form of government as will best secure protection to person and property and develop the arts of peace, giving to the inhabitants as large a share in their government as will be promotive of their happiness and welfare and consistent with the sovereignty of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I want now to come a little nearer to the present time. I want to show the character of the objections that are interposed against any further growth of our country, and especially against the acquisition of the Philippine Islands.

One objection is that they are too far off. They say they are 11,000 miles away, measured from one side of the country, and 7,000 from another side of the country. In these days, Mr. Chairman, distance is not so often a question. If a man is going from here to San Francisco, he does not inquire how far it is. He wants to know how long it will take him to go, and what is the price of a railroad ticket: and that is all. We have passed the day when distance has to be counted.

PHILIPPINES NOT TOO FAR AWAY.

The civilized man of the present is omnipresent and almost omnipotent. Too far, they say! Why, you can go from the United States, from San Francisco to the Philippine Islands and come back on a troop ship in two months. And yet when we acquired California it took six months to go there, and it was like going through a hell to get there. [Laughter.] You had to cross 2,000 miles of country uninhabited by anybody except wild Indians, buffaloes, prairie dogs, gophers, and coyotes. You had to pack your water supply oftentimes for a hundred miles, and it is estimated that one out of every seven persons who undertook the trip perished by the roadside. I have been over the overland route to California, and on the right and on the left are found the graves of the thousands of men, women, and children who lost their lives in that awful overland journey of six months.

Now, when you go to the Philippines, all that you have to do is to get on a ship and touch a button, and the balance is done for you. You can play cards, you can read books and newspapers, you can write sermons or political speeches, you can dance or pray or sing, you can attend dinner parties, you can do everything that you can do in your office or in your home on land; and all this while the ship is steaming away across the ocean at the rate of 15 miles an hour, and you are put down at Manila without having raised a drop of sweat, without having given a thought to the journey, without having lost a meal or an hour's sleep. And yet in this day some of us Americans have become so effeminate, either through wealth, or through excess of civilization, or through the refinements of political or theological polemics, that they dread boarding a ship to go to the Philippine Islands, when their forefathers girded up their loins, saddled their horses, packed their mules, yoked their oxen to their own wagons, and took their wives and their children, traveling on foot 3,000 miles across plains and deserts, across mountains and valleys, across creeks and rivers, among Indians and wild beasts, in order to reach California; and they were not afraid.

JOSHUA AS A LEADER OF EXPANSION.

To hear some of these men talk, I am reminded of what took place when the Children of Israel approached the promised land. They sent spies to look out the country, timid men, the Democrats of those days, and when these spies returned, what did they say? They said, "Oh, it is an awful country. The land devoureth the inhabitants, and the children of the giants are out there, the Anakim and the Zamzummim, and we, in their sight, are but as grasshoppers." That was the report of a Democratic investigating committee a thousand years before the Saviour was born, and they are still bringing in the very same reports. But notwithstanding all that, Joshua, at the head of the army of Israel, crossed the Jordan and occupied the country.

Mr. Chairman, I will just read you a summary of the objections raised against the acquisition of Louisiana and California. These objections were just as vociferously urged in their day as are the objections to the acquisition of the Philippines in our day.

OBJECTIONS TO THE ACQUISITION OF LOUISIANA.

First. Territory too large ever to be peopled.

Second. Population too large and too incongruous ever to become homogeneous with people of the original thirteen States.

Third. Impossibility of ever making the inhabitants fit for American citizenship.

Fourth. Territory too remote from the Atlantic coast ever to be anything more than a wild land roamed over by wild beasts and wilder men.

Fifth. If ever peopled like the Eastern States, it will eventually dominate these States and overwhelm their civilization and laws, and perhaps their religion and liberty.

Sixth. The United States have no constitutional power to acquire the territory.

Seventh. Parts of the territory are so remote as to be inaccessible to the influences of civilization, commerce, or religion.

Eighth. The expense of governing it will pauperize the people of the East, and no compensations therefor.

Ninth. Governing it will cost the lives of thousands of our sons, in battle or by disease.

Tenth. If ever peopled by white men, they will be as wild and lawless as the Indians and as unfit for civilization and citizenship, and they will be a menace to the Eastern States, and may in time subjugate them, as the Goths, Vandals, and other barbarians subjugated Rome.

OBJECTIONS TO ACQUISITION OF CALIFORNIA.

First. Too far away; can not be reached in less than six months either by land or sea.

Second. Population dissimilar in race, customs, traditions, laws, and religion.

Third. Impossibility of defending it against a foreign foe.

Fourth. It will shift the balance of territorial power from the Atlantic coast to the Pacific.

Fifth. It will introduce into our population a race of mongrels, unfit for our civilization, religion, or liberties.

Sixth. The land is mainly composed of deserts and mountains, the deserts blasted by unbearable heat and the mountains covered by unmeltable snow.

Yes, there were kickers, too, in those days, but they kicked against the pricks and were forced forward in spite of themselves. In vain they protested; in vain they predicted evil; in vain they prated about the Constitution; in vain they abused Jefferson as to Louisiana, and Polk as to California; in vain they swore they would never submit. The great mass of the American people, obeying the fundamental law of their heredity, went on in their acquisitions, with sublime confidence in their destiny, and now behold the glorious results!

I hate to say it, but the American who belittles expansion belittles not only the mighty statesmen and grand heroes who have expanded our country from the Gulf to the Lakes and from the Allegheny Mountains to the Pacific Ocean, but he belittles his own self and takes from his own head that glorious crown of citizenship which makes an American the foremost man in all the world.

THE TRUE AMERICAN SPIRIT.

How different the spirit now animating some men who think they are good Americans from that mighty spirit of patriotism that blazed up into one universal conflagration two years ago.

In the Spanish war the world beheld a marvelous spectacle. It saw the North and the South, the East and the West rally around the banner of the Republic as the great object of their love and loyalty. Fitzhugh Lee and Joseph Wheeler, mighty men who had battled for an independent Confederacy from 1861 to 1865, now fought side by side with the sons of Grant and Logan, and in the Congress of the United States men who served in the Confederate army joined the men who served in the Federal Army in voting men, money, and ships to uphold the cause of a reunited country.

There is an inspiring lesson in the very names of the ships which wrought the ruin of Spain's navies. At Manila the Olympia spoke for the great Northwest, and the Boston for the great Northeast. The Concord spoke for the old North and the Baltimore and Raleigh spoke for the new South, while at Santiago the Oregon spoke for the Pacific States, the Texas for the Gulf, the Brooklyn for our Atlantic coast, and the Iowa for the great Mississippi Valley. Every section and party of our mighty many-in-one thundered and lightened in the cause of liberty, and rained fire and iron hail upon freedom's enemies. And the descendants of the old Norsemen, the sons of the Vikings, were the men behind our guns.

They have another objection to the acquisition of the Philippine Islands. They say the people have not consented, and that we ought to get the consent of the people. Mr. Chairman, when did we ever get the consent of any people except those of the State of Texas? Never. When we drove the French out of the country between the Allegheny Mountains and the Mississippi River did we get the consent of the inhabitants? No, sir.

CONSENT OF THE PEOPLE.

When we bought Louisiana did we get the consent of the inhabitants? Not at all. The inhabitants were opposed to it to a man; and when the French flag was pulled down at New Orleans thousands of people cried like children to see the flag of their country hauled down upon the soil of North America forever. Who was President then? Thomas Jefferson, the apostle and high priest of Democracy. Did he say anything about the consent of the governed? No. He bought the people of Louisiana along with the soil, and as appendages or appurtenances to the soil; and that was Thomas Jefferson! And after we acquired Louisiana what did Thomas Jefferson do? He sent a military governor there, backed by United States bayonets, and gave that military governor the right to pass just such laws as he saw fit and to execute them at the point of the bayonet; and that was Thomas Jefferson!

No consent of the inhabitants there. When we acquired Florida was there any consent of the inhabitants? No; President Monroe sent Andrew Jackson, of Tennessee, down to Florida, and Andrew Jackson wrote upon a sheet of white paper just such laws as he wanted to prevail in the district of Florida, and enforced them by the United States Army. He was at the same time military commander, governor, legislature, judge, and sheriff, all combined; and he was another of the gods of the Democracy, and a great god he was, too. I am willing to sign and subscribe an affidavit to that effect. If Andrew Jackson were here to-day he would be standing side by side with his illustrious successor, William McKinley, in enforcing the sovereignty of the United States over all justly and constitutionally acquired territory. [Applause.] That is where Andrew Jackson would be, and where Thomas Jefferson would be, too, or else they would have to go back on the precedents they furnished us in the cases of Louisiana and Florida.

No, we have never asked for the consent of any people. Did we get the consent of the Mexicans when we annexed Upper California? No. Did we get the consent of the Spaniards when we annexed Florida? No. Well, now, I want some man to tell me whether the French and the Mexicans and the Spaniards are not as good people to consult as are the Tagalos and the Visayans in the Philippine Islands. Are the French to be written down as infants and incapable of giving consent? Are the Spaniards to be written down as infants and incapable of giving consent? Are the Mexicans of Upper California to be written down as infants and incapable of giving consent? No.

EXPANSION NOW BECOME A POLITICAL QUESTION.

The question of consent has never been raised in any of our acquisitions until this late day; and I want to say this—some on my side here may not agree with me in it, but I believe it to be true—I believe that if William Jennings Bryan had been elected President of the United States instead of William McKinley, the Spanish war would have come on all the same; that Dewey would have sunk the Spanish fleet in Manila Bay all the same; that the United States would have acquired the Philippine Islands all the same; that William Jennings Bryan, by the aid of an American army, would to-day be putting down Aguinaldo all the same, and that every man on the Democratic side of this House would be shouting "Hurrah!" and "Amen!" while some men on this side of the House would be kicking. Now, put that in your pipes and smoke it. [Laughter.]

This opposition to the acquisition of the Philippine Islands is political, and political only. So far as I am concerned, I welcome the issue, because no party yet has ever been able to stand up against the great wave of American expansion, and never will until the time comes to write our epitaph, and not until then; and that day may God in his wisdom and mercy put off forever.

Some say that we may have the right to buy land, but we have no right to buy people; and they sarcastically say that if we do buy people, they ought to be worth more than $2 a head.

When we bought Louisiana, some no doubt said, "$15,000,000 for 150,000 redskins, a hundred dollars per skin!" But if anybody did say it, no man has wasted paper in preserving his name; and if he has any descendants (which I doubt, as cowards have no children), they are not bragging about it.

When we bought Florida did we not buy Seminoles, alligators, bullfrogs, and mosquitoes? And the shallow-brained wits no doubt claimed that there was nothing to be admired about the territory but its name.

When we bought California, Arizona, Utah, Nevada, and New Mexico, no doubt the disgruntled politicians of 1848 inquired why we paid $15,000,000 for territories we had already conquered by the sword; and others wanted to know what use we had for territories beyond the Rocky Mountains, when we already had a million square miles of territory this side of the Rockies, inhabited by nothing but Indians, buffaloes, and prairie dogs.

And when a Democratic President bargained away Texas to Spain, did he not bargain away the Americans then living in Texas without their consent?

FILIPINOS NO BETTER THAN OUR INDIANS.

Others, again, say: "Are not the Filipinos as much entitled to their liberty as we are to ours?" Force rules the world, and all our rights are based on force, which is only another name for law. We drove out the Indians and robbed them of their lands, just as these Indians in their turn drove out a race that lived here before them; and thus race drives out race, one religion supersedes another, one barbarism supplants another, one civilization gives way to another, as a rule the better always superseding the worse.

Did not Massachusetts destroy her Indians and murder King Philip, who was an Aguinaldo in his day? Did not Virginia exterminate the Potomac Indians? Did not North and South Carolina and Georgia drive out their Indians? Did not we Tennesseans expel the Cherokees? Is Aguinaldo any nobler than was Pontiac? or Logan? or Tecumseh? or Osceola? or Black Hawk? or Captain Jack? or Sitting Bull? or Geronimo?

No; it is safe to say that these great Indian chieftains were one and all the superiors of Aguinaldo, and the red warriors of their tribes were far braver and greater lovers of liberty than the yellow-faced soldiers of the Philippines; and are we not, to-day, governing 200,000 Indians right here in the United States without their consent?

Another objection that is urged is that we have no use for the country. No use for it! That was said in 1753, when we started to acquire Mississippi, Alabama, Tennessee, Kentucky, West Virginia, western Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin. Why, they said, "We have plenty of country over here on this side of the Allegheny Mountains. England, that is nearly two thousand years old, is not thickly populated, and she has only 51,000 square miles, while we have got nearly 400,000 square miles, and we have enough land on the east of the Alleghenies to last us ten thousand years. Why, then, send our young men off across the Alleghenies to fight the French and Indians and bring on war and cause blood to be shed and money to be spent?"

But the spirit of expansion, the spirit of the Vikings, was in their hardy hearts, and we went forward. Then, when Thomas Jefferson acquired Louisiana, they said we did not need it, had no use for it, none whatever. So, when we acquired Texas, Daniel Webster said we had all the country we needed. All the Whigs all over the country said we had no use for it.

Mr. ROBB. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GIBSON. Certainly.

Mr. ROBB. I would like to ask the gentleman if he believes we are authorized by justice and morals to invade a country and take it because we have a use for it?

Mr. GIBSON. My friend and brother, nations do not go to Sunday school. If they did, you would to-day surrender all the property you have to the Indians—every dollar's worth of it—for, from your standpoint, it has all been the result of robbery.

Mr. ROBB. I have another question I would like to ask the gentleman. I would like to ask if he thinks that England is justified in the course she is now pursuing down in South Africa toward the Boers?

Mr. GIBSON. Ask me some question about Siberia. [Laughter.] It would have just as much to do with my argument. Such a question is an admission that the gentleman has nothing substantial to say.

Mr. ROBB. I have another question——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield further to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. GIBSON. Not for such irrelevant questions. No use for the country, no use for Texas, no use for Louisiana, no use for Florida, no use for California, no use for Oregon, no use for Alaska! Why, a member of Congress arose on the floor of this House and offered a resolution to give $7,200,000 to any nation on earth that would take Alaska off our hands.

Mr. GAINES. And yet you did not think that they ought to have a jury up there.

Mr. GIBSON. I see that I am stirring up the animals, although I have tried to keep very quiet. [Laughter.] No use for the territory! I am one of those men who believe in Providence; I do not know whether gentlemen on the other side believe in it or not, and I do not know whether everybody on this side believes in it or not, but I believe in it. I can not understand history any other way. I believe there is a Providence in this matter. Mr. Chairman, what would have been the condition of North America if the English, the Irish, the Germans, the Danes, the Swedes, and the Norwegians had not come over here?

Mr. ROBB rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

STATESMANSHIP LOOKS AHEAD ONE HUNDRED YEARS.

Mr. GIBSON. No, sir; unless my time is extended, I can not yield. What would be the condition of North America? It would be one vast wilderness inhabited only by heathen Indians—not a church, not a Sunday school, not a Bible, not a civilized man. Now see it—the glory of the whole earth, the admiration of all nations, and the nearest realization of a heaven on earth yet achieved by the children of men. Of course it has cost blood and cost treasure; it has caused injustice in individual cases; but we do not look at what is to-day or at what will be to-morrow. Statesmen look forward a hundred years, and looking forward a hundred years, when the Philippines will be like a new Jerusalem, come down from the skies, glorified by Christianity, ennobled by civilization, purified by the principles of liberty, and living happily under a republican government, then what will become of the men who rise in this Congress and want to know whether it is right to go and take possession of the Philippine Islands without the consent of the people there, just as no doubt four hundred years ago there were men in England who said it was wrong to come here and dispossess the red men?

No, Mr. Chairman, we are moving forward and moving onward, this great army of American civilization and American progression. Under the starry banner of Columbia there can be no such thing as legalized oppression, no more than there can be darkness under the light of the midday sun or iniquity in the courts of heaven. [Applause.]

APPENDIX.

Objections to the acquisition of Louisiana on the part of members of Congress.

The acquisition of Louisiana, in 1803, was vigorously opposed in Congress. Senator Pickering, of Massachusetts, said:

"It is declared in the third article [of the treaty] that the inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States. But neither the President and Senate, nor the President and Congress, are competent to such an act of incorporation. I believe the assent of each individual State to be necessary for the admission of a foreign country as an associate in the Union."

Senator White, of Delaware, said:

"But as to Louisiana, this new, immense, unbounded world, if it should ever be incorporated into the Union, of which I have no idea, it can only be done by amending the Constitution. I believe it will be the greatest curse that could at present befall us. It may be productive of innumerable evils, and especially of one that I fear ever to look upon. * * * Thus our citizens will be removed to the immense distance of two or three thousand miles from the capital of the Union, where they will scarcely ever feel the rays of the General Government."

Representative Griswold, of Connecticut, said:

"The vast and unmanageable extent which the accession of Louisiana will give the United States, the consequent dispersion of our population and the destruction of that balance which it is so important to maintain between the Eastern and Western States, threatens, at no very distant day, the subversion of our Union."

Representative Griffin, of Virginia, said:

"I fear the effect of the vast extent of our empire; I fear the effects of the increased value of labor, the decrease in the value of lands, and the influence of climate upon our citizens who should migrate thither. I fear (though this land is represented as flowing with milk and honey) that this Eden of the New World will prove a cemetery for the bodies of our citizens."

When, in 1811, the bill for the admission of the present State of Louisiana—the mere southern corner of the Louisiana purchase—came before the House of Representatives, Josiah Quincy, of Massachusetts, said:

"To me it appears that it [the passage of the bill] would justify a revolution in this country, and that in no great length of time it may produce it.

"I am compelled to declare it as my deliberate opinion that if this bill passes the bonds of the Union are virtually dissolved.

* * * * * * *

"This Constitution never was and never can be strained to lap over all the wilderness of the West without essentially affecting both the rights and the convenience of its real proprietors. It was never intended to form a covering for the inhabitants of the Missouri and the Red River country; and whenever it is attempted to be stretched over it will rend asunder.

"Why, sir, I have already heard of six States, and some say there will be, at no great distance of time, more. I have also heard that the mouth of the Ohio will be far to the east of the center of the contemplated empire. * * *

"I oppose this bill from no animosity to the people of New Orleans, but from the deep conviction that it contains a principle incompatible with the liberties and safety of my country. * * * This bill, if it passes, is a death blow to the Constitution. It may afterwards linger, but, lingering, its fate will at no very distant period be consummated."

OBJECTIONS TO OREGON.

When the bill for the settlement of Oregon Territory came before the Senate in 1843, Senator McDuffie, of South Carolina, said:

"Why, sir, of what use will this be for agricultural purposes? I would not for that purpose give a pinch of snuff for the whole Territory. I wish to God we did not own it. I wish it was an impassable barrier to secure us against the intrusion of others. This is the character of that country. Who are we to send there? Do you think your honest farmers in Pennsylvania, New York, or even Ohio or Missouri will abandon their farms to go upon any such enterprise? God forbid!"

In opposition to the same measure, Senator Dickerson, of New Jersey, said:

"We have not adopted a system of colonization, and it is hoped we never shall. Oregon can never be one of the United States. If we extend our laws to it we must consider it as a colony. * * * Is the Territory of Oregon ever to become a State, a member of the Union?

"Never.

"The Union is already too extensive."

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Chairman, I now yield one hour to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I hope not to take all the time the gentleman has yielded to me. I have several times discussed the Philippine annexation question and questions cognate to it. I have hitherto attempted to discuss the higher phases of the question, from the standpoint of human liberty and world civilization. I shall discuss it to-day from a lower standpoint. I hate to discuss great questions from a groveling standard of dollars and cents, but there is a spirit of "commercialism" abroad in the land that absolutely demands that that phase of this question shall be met.

On yesterday, while my colleague from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE] was speaking, he was interrupted with a question from my friend upon my right [Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois] to this effect:

> Suppose the will of the Filipinos were ascertained, and they desired the Philippine Islands to be annexed to the United States, would that annexation be from a commercial standpoint advantageous or disadvantageous to us?

I shall take that as the text of the beginning of what I have to say, and I think I can show from the standpoint of American agricultural industry, and from the standpoint of the interest of American laborers, that the annexation of the Philippine Islands, if every Filipino man, woman, and child desired it, would not be advantageous to the United States and to its commerce, either absolutely as an original proposition, or in comparison with what we may do under comparatively free trade relations with them by treaty; and when I say comparatively free trade relations, I mean a trade which shall give us a right to free entry into their ports and not give them free entry to ours.

I think I can make it "plain, palpable, and obvious" that the most advantageous of these two positions is the position of giving these people a protectorate for a time until they learn how to stand up and walk by themselves, while we take advantage of the fact that we have stretched out our great arm to help them, to obtain such commercial expansion as we can, such commercial expansion as I believe they will readily grant. Everybody wants commercial expansion.

I believe they will readily grant perpetual free entry of American products to all their ports, and I believe in doing that we can solve the great question which is interesting a great many of you gentlemen on that side in your perplexity, namely, how to make them a part of the United States and at the same time, in contradiction of the decisions of the Supreme Court and all precedents of authority laid down by the Secretaries of State and the great publicists, fix one rate of import duty for New York, another for Pensacola and Nogales, and another for Manila. That is the task you are confronted with under your plan of colonial accession.

You can not hope to do this, as I hope to prove, if the Philippine Islands become definitely a part of the United States. If you do not make them a part of the United States and thereby bring them under the uniform-import clause of the Constitution, you can by treaty provisions obtain the utmost markets for our goods and abundant stations for our Navy, and yet avoid all injury to our agricultural interests and our labor and also many troublesome questions of citizenship. That is our plan. Commercial expansion pure and simple.

But before proceeding to that I want to argue the commercial question from a present, actual, practical standpoint—the standpoint of unwilling Filipinos protesting with arms in their hands against annexation and undergoing the process of military subjugation. I hope to prove that annexation will be the death knell to some of our laboring men and to some of our agricultural interests and a grave menace to others.

At the very forefront of this question it is well to remember that we have in the Philippine Islands to-day, wearing the blue uniform of the Republic, 65,000 men.

It is well to remember that it has been estimated again and again—and it is a conservative estimate—that, taking the rank and file and officers all together of the Army of the United States, that Army costs $1,000 per annum per man. A thousand thousand is a million, and sixty-five thousand thousand dollars is $65,000,000. You are then paying now $65,000,000 for the purposes of "benevolent assimilation," as you call it, or for purposes of conquest and greed, as I call it.

But whatever may be the purpose, that is what it is costing the people of this country. What are you getting as a possibility—not as an actuality? You might be getting as a possibility the entire trade of the entire Philippine Islands in imports and exports. That is the utmost possibility. Of course, however, that is practically improbable, because there are some things which we sell that they do not want, and there are some things which they sell which we do not consume.

But if you take it for granted that we could get the entire trade of the entire archipelago, including all the imports and all the exports, that neither Spain, Great Britain, France, China, nor Korea would trade a dollar with them, then upon the present basis you would get $30,000,000 a year, for that is the sum total of all their exports and imports with all the world as reported by the Bureau of Statistics of the United States Treasury Department; and if out of the exports on the one side and the imports on the other we should get 25 per cent clear profit, the American people would make one-fourth of those $30,000,000—some seven or eight million dollars. And who would make that? Not the plain people, but capitalists and syndicates, who would carry machinery and money thither for industrial exploitation, employing not American labor, because white men can not labor in the fields there—but coolies of every clime and race. Bring this question down to a paltry, miserable, contemptible question of dollars and cents, if you choose, and there is where you will find yourself!

But I have not made a fair calculation, because an American soldier in the Philippines, upon a conservative estimate made by gentlemen who think they know what they are talking about—and I think perhaps they do know—costs 40 per cent more than an American soldier in the United States. This is because of increased cost of subsistence and immense cost of transportation for men and munitions. Therefore your army out there is costing you, instead of $65,000,000 a year, $91,000,000 a year, three times the amount of the entire import and the entire export trade of the entire archipelago with all the world, and over ten times all possible profits that could possibly be made out of them.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me a single question?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. With pleasure.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. I have some diffidence in interrupting any gentleman in the course of his remarks, but I think sometimes we may arrive at some honest conclusion by a little interchange of thought. There is a great diversity of opinion as to just what course we should pursue in the Philippines in the immediate future.

I understand the chairman of the Anti-Imperialist League says that he believes that we should immediately withdraw all our troops from the Philippine Islands and leave them hereafter absolutely to their own devices. Now, in connection with the gentleman's remarks as to the expense of the maintenance of the Army, I would ask whether in his view that would be the wisest course for us now to pursue?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, the question is a little irrelevant to the immediate point I was discussing; but I am always glad to be interrupted by a gentleman so courteous as my friend from Illinois.

I have given my opinion upon that question by introducing into this House a set of resolutions expressing my views upon it, and also by two speeches upon this floor. Sometimes a man is put in a position in which he does not want to be put. I have been put sometimes in a position in which I did not want to be put.

Sometimes you find yourself in the midst of a fight, and you must fight it out, even though your better judgment tells you you ought not to have been in the fight, having been mistaken in its incipiency, and that as soon as you can make your peace with your antagonist from any honorable standpoint, you had better do it. Still, you can not stand still and let him knock you down. You would rather postpone explanations to him until after the fight. Meantime you can consult your own conscience. I am now probing the American conscience and judgment. [Applause.]

Now, let me leave that branch of the case and go on. Gentlemen may say in answer to my argument, "The Army will finally be drawn away from the Philippines, and even if that country is kept as a 'part' of the United States or as a 'possession' or 'dependency'" (and I care nothing about language—call it what you please—let us differ about ideas if we differ at all) "that Army will be reduced or entirely done away with."

I do not believe it; and I have behind me in my unbelief the history of the world. There is not a single instance in which a white or European race has held in subjection an Asiatic race where it has not been found necessary to keep up an immense army of occupation. Great Britain has found it necessary in the East Indies and in Egypt. France finds it necessary in Algiers and in Madagascar.

All nations have found it necessary wherever they have gone. You may stamp out this insurrection except for a few bushwhackers here and there; but every three months it will break out afresh. Is my friend aware of the fact that Great Britain was fifteen years in subduing the hill tribes of Jamaica, a miserable little country not larger scarcely than a county of Mississippi; and that even then, in order to obtain permanent peace, she had to enter into a treaty and give those people certain rights of tribal autonomy?

I say that when the so-called war is over you will have to keep at least 25,000 men in the Philippine Islands for all time as an army of occupation to prevent further insurrection. At a thousand dollars a man per year that is $25,000,000, and at 40 per cent increase it is thirty-odd million of dollars per annum, which is more than equal to all the present import and export trade of the Philippine Islands with all the world.

Now, my friends, I want to be perfectly fair. Gentlemen may say in response to that that the present commercial condition in the Philippines is not a fair sample of what it may be under the American flag when law and order and peace and justice and civilization and all those things have been introduced; when it has become the "New Jerusalem," as the gentleman from the mountain district of Tennessee [Mr. GIBSON] said a moment ago.

Let us be fair. Now, my friends, one of two things is absolutely certain, and I want in this connection especially to address those men who are engaged in cotton planting, who have been led off by the arguments of some men with interested motives who have wanted to dupe them into the belief that they would obtain a vast market there for cotton and cotton goods, and who have been led off also by some other men who are not knavish and do not desire to dupe them, but who are themselves ignorant of the conditions in the Philippine Islands and who, while duping the people, have duped themselves.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will my friend allow me before he enters upon that branch of his argument? He has made a very interesting statement in respect to the money cost of holding the Philippines. I would like to ask him if in the course of his remarks he is prepared to speak of the cost in the loss of human life?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I am not now. I am now addressing the spirit of "commercialism," and it unfortunately does not care a bawbee for human life, and consequently I am not talking about that at this moment. God knows there are higher things than this little money aspect of the case that I am discussing now—things that I would rather discuss—but I am confining myself to that aspect of the problem to-day.

Now, my friends, one of two things, as I have said, must follow, and I want to address this especially to men of the class I have indicated. Either commercial conditions in the Philippines will remain substantially as they are, or they will be vastly improved under our flag. If they remain as they are, then if all the Filipinos who wear clothes were to put into one gigantic order all the cotton they want for a year, and send it within one week to the city of New Orleans, it would not create a ripple upon the cotton market.

Now if, upon the contrary, we teach them to wear clothes, either in the schoolhouse or upon the battlefield, and we produce a condition of great industrial progression and improvement; if this dream that the brown man in the Orient can be imbued with the energy, the industry, progressiveness and goaheadativeness of white men in the Occident, if that shall be realized; if we should succeed in bringing about a vast industrial amelioration of industrial and commercial conditions by improved transportation facilities, by the introduction of labor-saving machinery, by the equal administration of the law, and by all the instrumentalities that can bring that about, then we may possibly create a valuable customer. But how will he become a valuable customer?

How, if not by first becoming a better producer? Because, except a man have the wherewithal to buy, he can not buy, and except he produce something to sell he can not obtain the wherewithal to buy. Now, suppose that you put these people in a position where they progress more marvelously than Japan has progressed. Suppose they increase in productive capacity to such an extent that they are capable of increasing their purchasing power twenty-fold. Upon what lines of increased production must they increase their purchasing power? What will be the lines of improved and increased production? Why, to-day the main exports of the Philippine Islands consist of sugar, tobacco, and hemp.

Do the tobacco growers of Connecticut and Maryland want to produce that sort of "industrial amelioration" in the Philippine Islands that will enable men who are employed at 20 cents a day, even if their wages double, as they have done in Japan, to compete with them in the Connecticut Valley and along the hills of Maryland?

Do the sugar planters of Louisiana want to get valuable customers for the manufactured goods of this country by enabling these people after putting up improved machinery for sugar manufacture to sell five, ten, twenty, fifty, a hundred fold as much sugar as they do now in competition with the Louisiana man who raises cane sugar? Does the man out West who has gone into the new industry of raising beet sugar want to annex competition?

You have had an object lesson in Hawaii. We gave Hawaiian sugar free entry to our ports and capitalists went there, introduced the best machinery, and imported from all parts of the world Japanese, Chinese, Portuguese, East India coolies, Negritos, and even Tagalos, to compete under the peonage contract system with our colored laborers in Louisiana and white farmers in Nebraska. Do you want more of it?

Congressmen have stood here loud-mouthing their opposition to Chinese immigration and to contract importation of labor, and these same lawmakers, because they think the people's eyes are not open, have already admitted tens of thousands of Chinese and Japs by the annexation of Hawaii, and now propose to admit 10,000,000 of pauper labor and their products to the freedom of trade and freedom of travel, secured to all parts of the Union by the Constitution. For whose benefit? Labor's? No! Syndicates and capitalists with money to work paupers? Yes!

Do the few hemp raisers who are yet left in the United States want to increase competition of that sort?

What is the capacity to raise these things? We are told in Government documents that only one-twentieth of their arable land is in cultivation.

But now, my friends, in that connection I will go a little bit further. These are the things that the Filipinos to-day export, but they are not the only things that they can export or did export when they were formerly in a condition of prosperity compared to what they are now. They then exported a large quantity of rice.

Do the rice growers of Georgia and South Carolina and Louisiana want to annex that sort of competition? And that is not all. I find from this Treasury document, page 1313, that as far back as 1818 these people exported over $25,000 worth of long-staple cotton. Remember, they had then no cotton gins. Remember how small were our own exportations at that time.

Some time ago I was talking to my friend the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] in the cloakroom, and he told me of a conversation that he had had with one of the Philippine commissioners about raising long-staple cotton in the Philippine Islands. I thought it must be a mistake, but it put me upon inquiry, and I consulted this document from which I have been quoting and which I have here, issued by the Treasury Department of the United States, and I find that in 1818 they actually exported that amount of long-staple cotton.

I find also that they exported "homespun fabrics of cotton," on page 1310 of this document, which is entitled "Summary of Commerce and Finance of the United States for November, 1899." On page 1311 I find this language: "The galleons used to carry from there spices, cotton fabrics, silks," etc. That led me to further investigate this matter, and now I want to tell you why I looked into it.

I come from a section of country that raises long-staple cotton. I am myself a producer of long-staple cotton. Lately Egyptian cotton has been coming in in larger and larger quantities, and during three or four seasons the prices of long-staple cotton have been cut down from between 14 and 16 cents, its old price, to between 7 and 9 cents by Egyptian competition. This year the price went up again, owing to a small crop in Egypt. Such was the result of the introduction of law and order and improved machinery and irrigation in Egypt, under the equal administration of English laws, in producing competition at our doors.

This thing went so far that a great many people down in my section of the country, forgetting the traditions of a lifetime, were knocking at the doors of Congress for a protective tariff upon long-staple cotton; men who had spent their lives denouncing a protective tariff as a robbery of the great mass of the consumers for the benefit of some class found themselves willing to rob the general consumer a bit further in order to benefit themselves. Being a cotton planter, I received a great deal of pressure to vote for a law to put money by tariff taxation into my own pocket, as well as into theirs.

It may suit the New England cotton manufacturer to get his long-staple cottons cheaper than he does now, but it happens to be our interest that he should pay enough for them to give us a profit upon our investments and a reasonable living besides. Now, I find in this book to which I refer (Foreman's) the following language, on page 361:

> Long-staple cotton was formerly extensively cultivated in the province of Llocos Norte, whence many years ago large quantities of good cotton stuffs were exported. This industry still exists. The cultivation of this staple was, however, discouraged by the local governors in order to urge the planting of tobacco for the Government supplies.

I wish to explain to the House here how that came about. The Spanish Government instituted, as did many governments in Europe, what is called the tobacco monopoly, the Government and the politicians and the farmers of the revenue thus becoming directly interested in encouraging the growth of tobacco leaf in the Spanish colonies, so that the utmost profit possible might be made out of the tobacco monopoly.

Orders were then issued, of course, from the home Government, and the local governors proceeded to discourage the cultivation of everything standing in the way of tobacco and to encourage the production of tobacco. This they did through revenue laws and administrative favoritism, to the enrichment of the monopoly. This author furthermore says: "Cotton spinning and weaving is still carried on on a reduced scale in the Llocos province."

I find, furthermore, in Fiske's "Story of the Philippines," on page 66:

> The long-staple cotton could be easily cultivated, and at one time there were cotton fields in northern Luzon. * * * It only needs enterprise and common sense to make cotton raising a valuable industry.

Mr. TERRY. Will the gentleman from Mississippi permit me to ask him a question there?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. TERRY. Is it not a fact that these various products that you have shown would come in competition with others in this country will be raised and produced and sent here by corporations and syndicates employing cooly labor?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It is a fact, and I am coming to that after a while. We have had an object lesson in Hawaii.

Mr. TERRY. And has it not been stated here and published in the public prints with reference to Cuba and the Philippines that unless a man had a million or more dollars' capital he could not make anything by going there, so that the plain people of this country will never be benefited by the present policy of the Administration?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Why, I do not know whether I can make it as strong as a million; but I am coming to that part of it after a while. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I did not hear him distinctly. The statement he made accords with all I have read or heard from Hawaii and the Philippines.

Now, my friends, these long staple cotton people have been knocking here. I am not a protectionist. I am not willing to lay a dollar of taxes upon any human being on the face of this globe in order to put an increased profit into my own pocket, but I will tell you how far I do go along that line. I am not in favor by any vote of mine of annexing oriental pauper competition against my constituents.

But, again, my friends, what sort of competition is this that we are about to annex?

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman yield a moment to me?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes, sir.

Mr. LACEY. By free trade you would annex the pauper competition of the whole world.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Oh, my friend, there is not the slightest danger of what you call "free trade," except when you are making a political speech. A Democratic "tariff for revenue" is "free trade" when you are making political speeches. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Besides that, free trade with those who compete with agriculture and labor alone is one thing, and free trade in all things—fair trade—is another. Give us free trade with all the world and we will risk it, but do not give us legislation which discriminates against the people for whom I now speak.

I will say further to my friend from Iowa that I heard my friend Mr. BAILEY of Texas say rather a good thing the other day. He said "his free-trade principles had never been remotely staggered except by one thought, and that was the prospect of competition, not from the white men, who have a decent standard of living, but from the brown man and yellow man of the Orient."

But to go further in my argument. When I examined this book of Foreman—which, by the way, I will commend you all to read, written by John Foreman, fellow of the Royal Geographical Society, and entitled "The Philippine Islands," written before this controversy arose, and without any political purpose—I found there a very important industry growing up in copra oil, an industry of making oil from cocoanut-palm nuts. I found that this oil is sent to exactly the same people in Europe who buy our cotton-seed oil.

It is an illuminant and lubricant and at the same time an edible oil, and it is being sent to France to mix with olive oil, and sent elsewhere to mix with the various other things which furnish healthy articles of food for humanity.

I found it a comparatively new industry. Beginning in 1890, the export was 4,653 tons; in 1892 the export had risen to twenty-two thousand and a few odd hundred tons in round numbers; in 1895 it had grown to 37,000 tons in round numbers; and in 1897, even with the war and trouble, it had grown to 53,750. In 1891 a cocoanut-oil factory, with modern appliances, was started near Manila.

Most of the cocoanut-oil factories, to use the language of our author, are "very rough, primitive establishments, built with eight or ten posts supporting a nipa-palm-leaf roof, and closed in at all sides with split bamboo. The nuts are heaped for a while to dry and concentrate the oil; then they are chopped up, and a man, sitting on a board, with his feet works a treadle, from which a rope is passed over to work to and fro a cylindrical block, in the end of which is fixed an iron scraper. He picks up the half nuts one at a time and on applying them to the scraper in motion the white fruit or pith falls into a vessel. These scrapings are then pressed between huge blocks of wood to express the oil." If they can export 54,000 tons in round numbers of this oil compressed in this crude manner, what amount could they not send out if our capitalists introduced our superb oil-mill machinery?

Now, take either horn of the dilemma you choose, whether the Philippines remain commercially as they are, when even their entire trade is not a drop in the bucket to any one of the industries of the United States, or whether they improve immensely, in which case they must improve along the lines of increased production in sugar, hemp, tobacco, rice, long-staple cotton, and copra oil.

Now, Mr. Chairman, already the cry has begun to "come up from Macedonia." Perhaps the New York press voiced it first; but its cry has been reinforced and swollen by the cries of the men from the Connecticut tobacco-raising country and from the men of the West who are raising sugar beets; and if there be any idea upon the part of any sugar planter of Louisiana to the effect that any agreement between Senators can bring around a state of things where the Philippine Islands can be kept at one and the same time out of the United States and in the United States, or at one and the same time kept neither out of the United States nor in the United States, they are horribly mistaken. They will find out their mistake, and their voices will increase the wail.

The courts will be called upon to consider the question; and if the courts decide as they have hitherto done, if they follow the uniform precedents beginning before the time of John Marshall, but voiced most forcibly by John Marshall in the case of Blake against Loughborough, and then by Justice Curtis, and then by Justice Taney, and lastly by Chief Justice Fuller himself, under these precedents it will be found incumbent on them, if precedents have any weight or authority, to decide the first time the question arises, when a man has imported goods from San Juan to some port on the Atlantic or from Manila in the Philippines to San Francisco, and refuses to pay duty, that the Louisiana sugar and the beet sugar of the West must meet the competition of the sugar of this people in the open markets of the country.

Now, to return to what I was on the eve of saying when interrupted by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY], what sort of competition and by what sort of people is it, my friends? Here on page 334 of this book—Foreman's—I find a statement of the wages actually paid in a sugarhouse and sugar factory over there; and all my friends from sugar and cotton districts will understand that men employed three months—a sort of harvest time—in a sugar warehouse are a superior class of labor to those who are employed in ordinary cotton-field work.

Let me give you what these men are paid. One hundred laborers, $1.50 per week for the season of three months. They are the high-priced ones, employed in "harvest time." Forty laborers, at $4 a month for the whole year round. Four overseers—God save the mark—are paid the munificent wage of $6 per month each the whole year round. I find but two men that get money enough to keep soul and body together, one a machinist, who gets $30 a month, and another a manager, who gets a salary of $1,500.

Then I find this curious entry here: "Food for the laborers during the whole time of service," 145 laborers, for all these laborers for a year, "$2,000!" Something less than $15 apiece a year to feed the whole business! I suppose the high-priced fellows who got $6 a month lived high, and that must have brought down the average for the others. That is the sort of competition you are introducing here—annexing unnecessarily.

Now, my friends, I say that "cries have come up from Macedonia," and they have begun to have some effect. Why, some time ago the President said it would be rank injustice to tie Puerto Rico to us as a part of the body politic and then starve her to death with a protective tariff.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] introduced a bill in this House along the lines of the President's recommendation, and a bill was introduced in the Senate, and then your ultra-protectionist constituents came after you and you got scared to death; then the Ways and Means Committee appointed a "subcommittee on lexicography" to determine what the words "United States" meant.

John Marshall had decided, in Blake against Loughborough, that it was the name our ancestors chose to give to the great Republic and that it included every Territory and foot of ground over which the United States had jurisdiction. But John Marshall was to be forgotten, Jay was to be forgotten, Hamilton, Daniel Webster, all the great masters of the school of loose construction, as well as those of the strict construction school, were to be forgotten.

The Supreme Court decisions had to be forgotten. "Political necessity," the tyrant's plea, entered into this House of Representatives, so that I understand that it has been now authoritatively reported by a majority of the Ways and Means Committee that "United States" does not include the Territories of the United States. This is "official," as they say in "Pinafore." Why? Ah, because the Connecticut tobacco growers were beginning to find out something. The western sugar-beet raiser was beginning to see a little farther than the end of his nose.

Louisiana sugar planters had found a new "nigger in the wood pile," who was not as useful as the one they have now. Men were waking up to the "cries from Macedonia." Moreover, laboring men from this country had learned something about the decisions in that august tribunal, the Supreme Court—a court which I decline to believe to be either corrupt or a political machine even to this day. I believe it will stand as it has stood so many times athwart the path of political necessity and athwart the path of party ambition.

The laboring men began to find out that the Constitution not only guaranteed freedom of trade between the States, but freedom of travel as well as freedom of traffic. They began to find out that the great Chief Justice of this country had announced that, in the opinion of the Supreme Court, when we annex a territory, at the moment we annex the land we annex the inhabitants, and when you annex them you annex them as citizens of the United States entitled to all the civil and personal liberties and rights of citizens—not the power to vote, of course, because that is a privilege and not a right under our laws—but all the personal and civil rights, including the right to remove from Manila to San Francisco or New York.

Mr. TAWNEY. In what opinion does the gentleman find that decision?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I am going to cite that and a great many more in a few minutes. I will cite them in a few seconds. Do not be uneasy. The laboring men began to find out that cases had gone up from nearly every Territory when it was in its infancy, some of them involving the application of the eight first amendments, containing the Bill of Rights, some of them involving the construction of the import clause declaring that "imports shall be uniform in all parts of the United States," and some involving other personal rights of various sorts.

But gentlemen say—and I want to state their position before I undertake to answer it—"We are not going to subject our people to this competition; we are not going to make the Philippines 'a part' of this country; we are going to make them 'a possession' of the Republic, 'a dependency' of the Republic, 'a colony' of the Republic." Words, idle words! Pure, unadulterated political wind!

Why, my friends, you can not have an imperio in republica; you can not have an empire within the Republic. We have a written constitution, and that written Constitution created the Government. How can a government which is the creature of a written constitution legally govern anything in any manner except in the manner provided by the constitution which created it and gave it power within its own limits to legislate? Daniel Webster himself said that no government upon the American Continent possessed, in the European sense, sovereignty; that sovereignty was in the people who had created both the Constitution and the State and the National Governments.

And when the people of the States created the Federal Government it was merely through the instrumentality of that Constitution and within its limits, not outside of it, that they created it. It is barbarous and absurd to speak of a government which is a creature of the constitution which can, through its congress, impose laws upon a people, and at the same time deprive those people of the right to appeal to the highest law—its own creator and source—namely, the constitution itself; which gave birth to the government.

On this question we are met by two different sets of men, giving two different answers. The rough soldier, in the person of General Merritt, is reported in the newspapers as saying—whether he said it or not—"We have outgrown the Constitution; what is the use of talking about it?"

And then men like a distinguished Senator whose name I have in my mind, coming from a State whence good lawyers have come, made a long and elaborate argument upon the floor of the Senate to prove that every father of the Republic was wrong, that the Constitution itself was wrong when it said all powers not granted to the Government are reserved to the States and to the people, and that this is a government of delegated, not inherent powers. This Senator undertook to show that in foreign affairs, at any rate, this Government has all the "inherent" rights of Great Britain.

But, my friends, with all due deference to both sides—the impulsive explosion of the rough soldier—to be excused because he entertained, of course, the habitual and professional contempt of the soldier for civil institutions—and the argument of the lawyer—all this is absurd. You can not hold the Philippines at one and the same time outside of the Union and inside of the Union.

You can not legislate for foreigners if they be foreigners; and if they be not foreigners, then they must be inhabitants of the territory of the United States; and if that territory shall have been annexed, then its inhabitants were annexed; and if annexed, they were annexed as cititizens, because we can not have subjects. As the Supreme Court says—and I will refer to the language in a moment—the very moment and fact of annexation works a change of allegiance.

On common-sense principles the opposite contention would not do for a people with a written constitution.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman allow one question?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes, sir.

Mr. TAWNEY. How did the men who made the Constitution legislate for the people inhabiting the territory northwest of the river Ohio?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Why, for the easiest reason in the world——

Mr. TAWNEY. How did they do it?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Why, Mr. Chairman, we have heard a dissertation this morning on the history of the United States; I do not want to go into another one. The gentleman certainly knows that they never undertook to legislate for the Northwestern Territory until after the States that had a title to the Northwest Territory had ceded that territory to the government of the Confederacy. That was before the Constitution went into effect.

Mr. TAWNEY. But how did the men who made the Constitution—the men who sat in the First Congress of the United States—legislate for that territory?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Why, when they made the Constitution itself were they not legislating for Virginia and Massachusetts and Connecticut? Were they not legislating for all the parts of Virginia and Massachusetts and Connecticut? And when those States ceded those lands to the Government, did not the Government have to accept the cession, and did they not thereby become a part of the public domain—a part of the Union—and subject to further legislation?

Mr. TAWNEY. Not in the judgment of the men who made the Constitution, because they reenacted the ordinance of 1787, making that territory a part of the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Undoubtedly.

Mr. TAWNEY. Then it was not a part of the United States before.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. This reenactment was deemed necessary, or at any rate advisable, because in the meanwhile they had founded a new Government entirely; a new Government had been formed by the accession of the various States, some of which had formerly owned this land; and it became necessary that these lands should become a part of the new Government as well as of the old.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman pardon a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes, sir.

Mr. HILL. I ask it because I value the gentleman's opinion; not with any desire to antagonize his views.

I find in the United States Statutes at Large a treaty of alliance between France and the United States, under the date of February 6, 1778—eleven years before the Constitution was adopted—a treaty which was annulled nine years after the Constitution was adopted. That treaty contains in Article V this language:

> Conquests that shall belong to the United States:
> If the United States should think fit to attempt the reduction of the British power remaining in the northern parts of America or the islands of the Bermudas, those countries or islands, in case of success, shall be confederated with or dependent upon the said United States.
>
> BENJAMIN FRANKLIN.
> SILAS DEANE.
> ARTHUR LEE.

What did that mean?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. That was a recognition on the part of France and of the controlling authorities of the United States that the United States, being engaged in war with Great Britain, had a right to make conquests—a right not disputed by any judge of any court. It admitted the right to acquire territory by conquest, which has never been disputed, I believe, by anybody.

France and the United States thereby entered into a treaty that these lands should become and remain, if conquered, a part of the United States. I suppose the purpose upon the part of France was to keep the United States from ceding them back in the treaty of peace to Great Britain and thereby arming her great hereditary enemy with additional territorial power as against her.

Mr. HILL. But what would be their relation as dependencies of the United States?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. They could not have been "dependencies" of the United States in any sense excluding them from the benefits of the Union. That proves that even great men sometimes use words which seem to mean one thing when they mean to express other things.

In a certain sense everything is a "dependency" of the United States; but our Supreme Court has held that when a Territory and its population become a "dependency" of the United States, it becomes a "part" of the United States; that the population become citizens of the United States, and that they are—land and people—alike covered by the Constitution as by a blanket; that every right guaranteed by the Constitution to anybody is guaranteed to them.

Now, gentlemen, I want to give some of these authorities. And, by the way, I will say to gentlemen who are seeking information that I bought a number of the Conservative Review for February, 1899. The first article which appears in it is entitled "The Constitution and absolutism." I do not know the man who wrote it.

I never heard of him until I read this article, but it is the most masterful and exhaustive compilation and collocation and analysis of authorities upon this question that I ever saw. He starts out in the beginning by saying that he is not going to quote a single publicist or statesman who belongs to the so-called "strict-construction" school, because their authority would carry little weight with a great many men who are imperialists, but that he intends to quote Jay and Hamilton and Marshall and William Everett and Daniel Webster among his statesmen, and the Supreme Court, with its binding decisions.

Then he takes up every decision that Senator PLATT referred to in his speech in the Senate and traces it back, and, with the one solitary exception of an utterance in an interruption upon the part of Daniel Webster on the floor of the Senate, every one of them is shown to be either misquoted or misconstrued.

Now, I will read you some of them. Alexander Hamilton is the father of Federalism, and through Federalism the father of the Republican party.

Alexander Hamilton thus announced the rule for determining the constitutionality of a proposed measure:

> If the end be clearly "comprehended within any of the specified powers," and if the measure have an obvious relation to that end, and is not forbidden by any provision of the Constitution, it may safely be deemed to come within the compass of the national authority.

Note the language. "If the end be comprehended within the Constitution," then the means need not be specifically stated. In other words, if you have the right as an end to acquire territory, then you can acquire it by one means or another not necessarily specified. If you have the right as an end to carry on a banking business, then you have a right as a means to issue a charter, and so on. What is the end? Why, it must be a constitutional end, or else it can not be "comprehended within" any of the clauses of the Constitution.

Chief Justice Jay announced the same doctrine,[1] and Chief Justice Marshall declared:

> The Government of the United States can claim no powers which are not granted to it by the Constitution; and the powers actually granted must be such as are expressly given, or given by necessary implication.[2]
> This instrument contains an enumeration of the powers expressly granted by the people to the Government.[3]

Daniel Webster asserted the same rule. In the "Reply to Hayne" he said:

> The National Government possesses those powers which it can be shown the people conferred upon it, and no more. The people erected this Government. They gave it a Constitution, and in that Constitution they have enumerated the powers which they bestow on it. They have made it a limited Government. They have defined its authority. They have restrained it to the exercise of such powers as are granted.
> It is a Government of strictly limited powers; of enumerated, specified, and particularized powers; and whatever is not granted is withheld.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. One moment, sir.

And right in that connection, Daniel Webster, in that same speech, gave utterance to the thought that I mentioned a moment ago.

You remember for a long time there was a great quarrel in this country as to where "sovereignty" rested, whether in the Federal Government or in the State government, and Daniel Webster said that in the European sense there is no sovereignty in any government here; that the people were sovereign; they have created the existing governments, and can uncreate them; the people created the States, and then the people of the States, respectively, created the Federal Government by means of the Constitution, and created it to operate within the limits of that Constitution.

Now, the people, the sovereigns, can change your Federal Constitution whenever they please by amending it. By proceeding in the proper way they can absolutely nullify and annul it. How? Why, they could hold a new constitutional convention, repeal the old Constitution, and pass a new one, or they could even go so far, if they chose, as to hold a new constitutional convention, all of them being represented there, and repeal this present Constitution without putting anything in its place, thus relegating us to the unwritten constitutional law of the English-speaking race—the common law.

But until your Constitution is altered, amended, or annulled, then, no man can vote against its plain, palpable, and obvious provisions without committing perjury in the sight of the great God before whom he raised his hand when he was sworn in as a member of this House.

Why, gentlemen, but for the miserable plea of political necessity nobody ever would have been bold enough to announce that any part of this globe could be at one and the same time neither in the Union nor out of the Union; or, if in the Union, that it would not be in the same Union that you and I are in, namely, the Union created by the Constitution, governed by the Constitution, and which breathes and lives and has its being within the limits of the Constitution.

But let us go on and read some more. I am not going to read all of these authorities in this Review, but I am going to put nearly every one of them in the RECORD. Let us read from some of the text writers. Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, page 11——

Mr. MORRIS rose.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I promised to yield to him.

Mr. MORRIS. Did the gentleman from whom you read give all the quotations or did he pretend to give all the quotations from Daniel Webster on this subject?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. No; I am going to give some more in a minute, and one of them seems to be on your side, and after I have read it I am going to explain it.

Mr. MORRIS. Since you are on that subject——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman excuse me if I ask him to tell me what the case is to which he would refer? Was it the speech of Webster in the Senate when he was discussing the Calhoun resolutions? If so, I have it here and it will go into my remarks.

Mr. MORRIS. I refer to a speech in the Senate of the United States as late as the year 1848.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left? I ask because I think the speech of Webster referred to will be covered by me if I can go on.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has twelve minutes left.

Mr. MORRIS. I will allude to the matter when I come to it in my own remarks.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. TAWNEY. I want to ask the gentleman in reference to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States which he says holds that when we annex territory to the United States we thereby make the inhabitants of that territory citizens of the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. For the gentleman's benefit I will come to that case first, although it is not in the immediate line of my argument, and I think it is a little out of the way to have me come to that first. I will come to it now, however, if I can find it. Here it is.

It has been stated by the Supreme Court that, even independent of an express stipulation by treaty, the allegiance of the inhabitants of the territory acquired is ipso facto transferred to the United States.

Now, here is the language of the court, and the justice who pronounced this decision was Chief Justice Marshall himself. Here is the language:

> The same act which transfers that territory transfers the allegiance of hose who remain in it.

Mr. TAWNEY. Does that make them citizens under the Constitution?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Why, Mr. Chairman, if a man is not a citizen of the country to which he owes his allegiance, if that country be the United States, what is he?

Mr. TAWNEY. Does that make him a citizen under the Constitution?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Undoubtedly. It may not make him a voter, but it makes him a citizen, entitled to the personal and civil rights guaranteed by the first eight amendments, containing our Bill of Rights, and to all the other trading and personal guarantees of the Constitution. I have quoted from 1 Peters, 511. But the Supreme Court goes further, and the Chief Justice, in Boyd against Thayer (114 U. S. Reports, page 159), says:

> The nationality of the inhabitants of a territory acquired by conquest or cession becomes that of the government under whose dominion they pass.

Mark the language, "nationality." If a man's nationality is American, then he is a citizen. Can the gentleman deny it?

Why! Is the gentleman going to contend that the United States can have subjects? I ask you that, and I dare you to say that.

Mr. TAWNEY. No, sir; I do not say so.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Then what can the United States have except citizens? If they are all equal and of American "nationality," then they are American citizens. If not citizens, then I ask you again what they are? I challenge a reply. If not subjects, what else can inhabitants be except citizens? I await a reply from any of you.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mugwumps.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. If they are not citizens, what are they?

Mr. WEEKS. Inhabitants of the Territory.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Oh, inhabitants! Well, then, if an inhabitant is neither a subject nor a citizen, what is he?

Mr. GAINES. They are Republican microbes. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. A gentleman says they are "international mugwumps." Perhaps that is an answer. It is as satisfactory as any that can be given.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman define what Indians are?

[1] See Jay's Writings and Correspondence, Volume III, page 306.
[2] See Martin against Hunter's Lessee, 1 Wheat., 304, 326.
[3] See Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheat., page 1.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Indians are recognized as foreign tribes—aliens—under our wardship or under our guardianship or protectorate or suzerainty, and we make treaties with them, just as if they were foreign powers. We do not pretend, except through those treaties or authority given by the treaties to exercise any power over the Indian lands or the Indian people. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman say whether they are subjects or whether they are citizens?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. They are foreigners; I have told you they are not citizens of the United States. Some are citizens of the Choctaw Nation, some of them are citizens of the Cherokee Nation, and they are bound by our authority only so far as they themselves have consented to be bound by it through treaties. [Applause.]

Sometimes, to be sure, we have forced them to make treaties; but always we have forced obedience under the pretense of treaties; and when we pretend to exercise any authority over them at all, it is in pursuance of treaties made with them. They are called in the Constitution "Indians not taxed."

Mr. McRAE. Following up the gentleman's suggestion, I would like him to ask the gentleman on the other side if the proposition is to give to the inhabitants of those islands the same status as the Indians?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. They will not answer that. [Laughter.] The United States can not have any subjects. I challenge any man on that side to say that the United States can have subjects. I have waited for a reply. No man has said so, and no man will say so.

No man will get up and say we can have an imperium in republica, or an empire within the Republic, and yet, upon the other hand, there is not one of you who will rise in his seat and say—and I challenge you to do so, and will pause for reply—that he would be willing to admit these Philippine Islands, with their 10,000,000 people, at any time as States in the American Union. I dare anyone to say it. I dare you to go on record. Is there one of you? Not one.

Mr. WEEKS rose.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, one sentence and then I will yield to the gentleman. Let us not play with fire; let us be frank and honest with one another and frank and honest with the country. If you are going to make subjects of these people, and make them subjects of an eternal, perpetual, imperial, military despotism, say so bravely.

My friends, I state to you frankly and with a full intent to mean all I say, that, as far as I am concerned, when I hear people say, "I am in favor of Philippine annexation, but I am opposed to imperialism," my reply is that I am much more opposed to annexation of the Philippines in its old, historic American sense—that is, the expansion of our institutions over them and their partnership as equals with us in the Union—than I am to the new-fangled doctrine of imperialism.

As much as I would hate to see the Declaration of Independence thrown to the winds, as much as I would hate to see the old, historical landmarks of Washington's Farewell Address forgotten, as much as I should hate to see the Constitution amended so that we might have subjects, I would rather frankly change the Constitution, I would rather be relegated to the unwritten constitution of the English-speaking race—the common law itself—than to admit 10,000,000 barbarians like those to share and share alike with me and my children and my grandchildren in molding the destinies of this great Republic—the last hope of all the ages for popular freedom and for the demonstration of the fact that man can govern himself. [Applause.]

Ah, but gentlemen tell me that these people over there are not fit to govern themselves. In what chancel of God were you made the judges? I am willing to stand by them for five years or for ten years until they prove they can govern themselves, if they can not now. But I tell you, gentlemen of the House of Representatives, that the right of self-misgovernment is no less divine than the right of self-government. I am sure only that they have no divine or other right to govern or misgovern me. But to govern themselves; that is different.

Who is to pronounce the judgment? Where will you stop if you once begin to take people who can not govern themselves and say that they must be governed by me and you or by Great Britain or France or Germany or by somebody else? Did not Admiral Dewey say that these people were more competent for self-government than the Cubans, and do not you and I know that the Cubans are more competent and capable of self-government than the Nicaraguans and the Costa Ricans and the Venezuelans? And yet we are not waging a war on Nicaragua or Costa Rica to establish our military tutelage because they can not govern themselves.

I have as high a regard for the white man as any man that ever existed. I am perhaps fanatical in my race pride. I believe that God has chosen our race as the instrumentality for the propagation of all that is civilized and all that is cultured in this world. But at the same time, my friends, no man can ever learn self-government when held in tutelage. Lord Macaulay said, and said well, that if you keep a man in darkness until he can stand the light, he would remain in darkness forever. So it is with man's capacity for self-government. I will now yield to the gentleman from Michigan, who wanted to interrupt me.

Mr. WEEKS. I want to ask the gentleman if, in the treaty of Paris, the inhabitants of Puerto Rico were not mentioned as inhabitants, and did it not differ from the other treaties like the treaty of Mexico? Now, did it not leave to Congress alone the decision as to what should be done with these people?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, they put the word "inhabitants" in the treaty purposely, I suppose, because they did not want to tell whether they were going to hold them as subjects or keep them as citizens. But that stands for nothing; anybody is an inhabitant; you might be an American citizen, for example, and yet an inhabitant of Italy. I do not think that is relevant.

Mr. WEEKS. Did not the treaty leave it to the Congress to settle the status of these people?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Oh, I catch the gentleman's point. The gentleman now is going to the point of contention that if the ordinary law of Congress is not superior to the Constitution, then a treaty, as a special sort of a law, is superior to the Constitution.

A treaty is but a law. That question has also been settled by the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court has held that the Constitution is the highest law of this land, no matter what other sort of law may be brought into clash with it. I did not understand at first what the gentleman was talking about.

Now, I go on with some of these authorities.

There are some things here which are so strong that I want to read them to this House. Here is the language of Mr. Justice McLean:

> In organizing the government of a Territory Congress is limited to means appropriate to the attainment of the constitutional object.
> No powers can be exercised which are prohibited by the Constitution or which are contrary to its spirit; so that, whether the object may be the protection of the persons and property of purchasers of the public lands or of communities who have been annexed to the Union by conquest or purchase, they are initiatory to the establishment of State governments, and no more power can be claimed or exercised than is necessary to the attainment of the end. This is the limitation of all the Federal powers.

And Mr. Justice Curtis said of the power of Congress over the Territories:

> "I can not doubt that this is a power to govern the inhabitants of the Territory, by such laws as Congress deems needful, until they obtain admission as States."

It is a striking fact that Chief Justice Marshall, in a memorable opinion, finds the sole and entire defense of our system of Territorial government in the same doctrine, namely, that territory held and governed by Congress is held and governed under the Constitution to be admitted into the Union as States. The decision to which we refer is the one delivered by the Chief Justice in the case of Loughborough vs. Blake. (101 U. S., 129 [1897].)

In that case it was contended that the citizens of the District of Columbia, not being represented in Congress, could not be subjected to direct taxation, which the Constitution provides shall be apportioned, like Representatives, among the several States according to their respective numbers. It was claimed that if the United States could impose direct taxes upon citizens residing out of the States of the Union and having no representation in the Government, such was clearly a case of "taxation without representation," which the colonies made the chief cause of revolt against Great Britain.

The question was here unmistakably presented as to whether the Constitution contemplated or permitted a colonial system. Chief Justice Marshall, having held that direct taxation could be applied to the District and to the Territories as well, found the reply to the above question in the fact that statehood was the end necessarily intended and marked out by the Constitution for the Territories of the United States.

Now, let me read another citation stronger even than that:

> During the interim between the decision in Loughborough vs. Blake and that in Scott vs. Sanford that tribunal had distinctly announced the same doctrine in the important and instructive case of Pollard's Lessee vs. Hagan (3 How., pages 221, 223), and that case was in that particular fully affirmed in 1893 in the case of Shively vs. Bowlby (152 U. S., page 49), in which the court asserted:
>
> "The Territories acquired by Congress, whether by deed of cession from the original States, or by treaty with a foreign country are held with the object as soon as their population and condition justify it of being admitted into the Union as States, upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects, and the title and dominion of the tide waters and the lands under them are held by the United States for the benefit of the whole people, and as this court has often said, in trust for the future States."
> In the same case the court, summing up its conclusions, adds (page 57):
>
> "Upon the acquisition of a territory by the United States, whether by cession from one of the States, or by treaty with a foreign country, or by discovery and settlement, the same title and dominion passed to the United States for the benefit of the whole people, and in trust for the several States, to be ultimately created out of the territory."
>
> In Murphy vs. Ramsay (114 U. S., page 45) to the same effect it was said:
>
> "The power of Congress over the Territories is limited by the obvious purposes for which it was conferred, and those purposes are satisfied by measures which prepare the people of the Territories to become States in the Union."
>
> The same doctrine is distinctly laid down by Mr. Justice Field in Weber vs. Harbor Commissioners (18 Wallace, page 65), and it is notable that all these later decisions contain express references to the Dred Scott decision for the propositions they announce.
>
> The views of the late Mr. Justice Cooley fully coincide with those above stated. In his Constitutional Law (pages 169 to 170), he says:
>
> "It could never have been understood that any territory which by purchase, cession, or conquest should at any time come under the control of the United States should permanently be held in a Territorial condition, and the new States which have been formed of territory acquired by treaty must be supposed to have been received into the Union in strict compliance with the Constitution."

He cites Scott vs. Sanford (19 How., page 447), and continues:

"And when territory is acquired, the right to suffer States to be formed therefrom and to receive them into the Union must follow of course, not only because the Constitution confers the power to admit new States without restriction, but because it would be inconsistent with institutions founded on the fundamental idea of self-government that the Federal Government should retain territory under its imperial rule and deny the people the customary local institutions."

The same learned authority, distinguishing, as did Chief Justice Marshall, between the Territories of the United States and the American colonies under Great Britain, points out that—

"There are differences which are important and, indeed, vital. The first of these is that the Territorial condition is understood under the Constitution to be merely temporary and preparatory, and the people of the Territories, while it continues, are assured of the right to create and establish State institutions for themselves as soon as the population shall be sufficient and the local conditions suitable; while the British colonial system contained no provision or assurances of any but a dependent government indefinitely." (Page 36.)

"Besides being thus embodied in the jurisprudence of the country, the doctrine in question is fully supported by our political philosophy."

"Edward Everett finely points out 'the inherent incongruity of colonial government with the principles of constitutional liberty.' He analyzes that form of government and shows that 'in its very nature it is inconsistent with the requirements of constitutional freedom, either to the colony or the mother country,' and that it 'obstructs the growth of liberty in the colonies and favors the growth of arbitrary power in the mother country.'" (Everett's Works, Volume I, page 530; also Volume II, page 489.)

Daniel Webster's Works, Volume V, page 300, says:

In the part which I have acted in public life it has been my purpose to maintain the people of the United States what the Constitution designed to make them—one people, one in interest, one in character, and one in political feeling. If we depart from that we break it all up. Arbitrary governments may have territories and distant possessions because arbitrary governments may rule them by different laws and different systems. Russia may rule in the Ukrane and the provinces in the Caucasus and Kamchatka by different codes, ordinances, or ukases. We can do no such thing. They must be of us, part of us, or else strangers.

Mr. Calhoun also, in opposing the annexation of Mexico to the Union, pointed out plainly that it would be impossible to incorporate that territory into the Union or to admit it as a State. He showed that if annexed it would have to be ruled as a dependent province or colony, which, he declared, would be totally incompatible with the Constitution and in the end subversive of our free institutions.

Note also the following language from Pomeroy's Constitutional Law, section 492:

But is Congress absolute over these districts or territories? Is it, like the British Parliament, bound by no limitations save those which are self-imposed? This can not be; nor does the language of the Constitution require a construction so much opposed to all our ideas of civil polity. The safeguards of individual rights—those clauses which preserve the lives, liberty, and property of the citizen from the encroachments of arbitrary power—must apply as well to that legislation of Congress which is concerned exclusively with the District of Columbia, or with the Territories, as to that which is concerned with the States.

The reasoning which leads to this conclusion is irresistible. A bill of rights is certainly no less important for the District of Columbia and for the Territories than for that portion of the nation which is organized into States. If it were thought necessary that Congress should be hedged round with restrictions while it is legislating for the inhabitants of States, who may be partially protected by their local governments, how much more necessary that the same body should be restrained while legislating for the inhabitants of those districts and Territories over which it has an exclusive control.

Chief Justice Marshall, in Blake vs. Loughborough, says:

The power, then, to lay and collect duties, imposts, and excises may be exercised, and must be exercised, throughout the United States. Does this term designate the whole or any particular portion of the American empire? Certainly this question can admit of but one answer. It is the name given to our great Republic, which is composed of States and Territories. The District of Columbia or the territory west of the Missouri is not less within the United States than Maryland or Pennsylvania; and it is not less necessary, on the principles of our Constitution, that uniformity in the imposition of imposts, duties, and excises should be observed in the one than the other.

In the early days of the Republic the first judges of the Supreme Court had announced substantially the same principle as that above quoted from Chief Justice Marshall. In the case of United States vs. More it was declared:

The Constitution was made for the benefit of every citizen of the United States, and there is no citizen, whatever his condition, or wherever he may be, within the territory of the United States, who has not a right to its protection.

Upon the point under consideration the language of the Dred Scott decision is explicit and decisive. Chief Justice Taney declared:

The power of Congress over the person and property of a citizen can never be a mere discretionary power under our Constitution and form of government. The power of the Government and the rights and privileges of the citizen are regulated and plainly defined by the Constitution itself. And when territory becomes a part of the United States the Federal Government enters into possession in the character impressed upon it by those who created it.

It enters upon it with its powers over the citizen strictly defined and limited by the Constitution, from which it derives its own existence, and by virtue of which alone it continues to exist and act as a government and sovereignty. It has no power of any kind beyond it, and it can not when it enters a territory of the United States put off its character and assume discretionary or despotic powers which the Constitution has denied to it.

It can not create for itself a new character separated from the citizens of the United States and the duties it owes them under the provisions of the Constitution. The Territory being part of the United States, the Government and the citizen both enter it under the authority of the Constitution, with their respective rights defined and marked out, and the Federal Government can exercise no power beyond what that instrument confers, nor lawfully deny any right which it has reserved. * * *

The powers over persons and property of which we speak are not only not granted to Congress, but are in express terms denied, and they are forbidden to exercise them. And this prohibition is not confined to the States, but the words are general, and extends to the whole territory over which the Constitution gives it power to legislate, including those portions of it remaining under Territorial government as well as that covered by the States.

In these propositions Mr. Justice Curtis concurred. They have also, as we shall see, been frequently affirmed by the Supreme Court, and Mr. Pomeroy, in his Constitutional Law, says of this part of the opinion of the Chief Justice:

The position assumed by the court that Congress in the exercise of its legislative function for the Territories is bound by the restrictive clauses of the bill of rights, can not be successfully attacked. Indeed, it can make no difference whether that body proceeds under the express grant of Article IV, or under its power implied in the capacity to acquire and hold additional soil. In either case, it is equally hedged round and trammelled by the safeguards of individual rights that are contained in the first eight amendments.

The doctrine has also been enunciated in recent decisions of the Supreme Court, oftentimes with express reference to the Dred Scott case.

In Murphy vs. Ramsey the Supreme Court declared:

The people of the United States as sovereign owners of the national Territories have supreme power over them and their inhabitants. In the exercise of this sovereign dominion they are represented by the Government of the United States, to whom all the powers of government over that subject have been delegated, subject only to such restrictions as are expressed in the Constitution, as are necessarily implied in its terms, or in the purposes and objects of the power itself.

* * * The personal and civil rights of the inhabitants of the Territories are secured to them as to other citizens by the principles of constitutional liberty which restrain all the agencies of government, State and national.

In National Bank vs. County of Yankton, the court, by Chief Justice Waite, on page 133, asserted:

All territory within the jurisdiction of the United States not included within any State must necessarily be governed by or under the authority of Congress. * * * The organic law of the Territory takes the place of a constitution as the fundamental law of the local government. * * * But Congress is supreme and for the purposes of this departmental authority has all the powers of the people of the United States, except such as have been expressly or by implication reserved in the prohibitions of the Constitution.

"In Callan vs. Wilson, which was a criminal prosecution by information in the police court of the District of Columbia, the accused claimed that the right of trial by jury was secured to him by the third article of the Constitution, as well as by the fifth and sixth amendments. The court held that the article and amendments of the Constitution referred to applied to the District of Columbia, saying in part:"

There is nothing in the history of the Constitution or of the original amendments to justify the assertion that the people of the District may be lawfully deprived of the benefit of any of the constitutional guarantees of life, liberty, and property. * * * We can not think that the people of this District have in that regard less rights than those accorded to the people of the Territories of the United States.

The author of Absolutism, or the Constitution, well says in conclusion:

If the powers of Congress over the Territories of the Union are discretionary, absolute, untrammeled by the above restraints of the fundamental law, as maintained in the speech of Senator PLATT, what is to prevent that body from violating all those safeguards of personal and civil rights? What limits can be assigned to its power? What security has the citizen of the United States living in its territory against the encroachments of arbitrary dominion? What could restrain a dominant faction in Congress from establishing the President as emperor or king over newly acquired territory and investing him with all the prerogatives of oriental despotism?

Against this infatuated departure from the great doctrines of constitutionalism, we caution the people of the Republic that their welfare and safety and the welfare and safety of their free institutions are vouchsafed alone by the written law. We admonish them that their Government can not endure half constitutional and half despotic. We warn them that the principle of absolutism once admitted, by which the Government created by the Constitution becomes lifted above its solemn declarations and restraints, heralds the ultimate doom of the Republic.

[Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi resumed his seat amid loud applause.]

Mr. HITT. I now yield one hour to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MORRIS].

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose to-day to discuss the constitutional questions as to the government of acquired territory growing out of the conditions presented by our recent acquisitions. From the beginning of the century we have been acquiring, governing, and controlling large areas of territory which did not originally belong to the United States, and it would seem that our right of acquisition, at least, no matter what may be our powers of government, have at all times been conceded by the members of all parties. It is true that it has recently been contended, and indeed by some strenuously maintained, that such acquisition could only be made for the purpose of ultimately admitting the territory as a State, or a number of States, into the Union. I think it will be apparent when we come to consider the grounds of our authority to acquire that this position is altogether untenable. It would seem to be too plain for argument that the framers of the Constitution and the people of the States who adopted it could not possibly have foreseen what territory the fortunes of war or the necessities of commerce or of self-preservation might bring to us, and also equally plain that it would have been absurd for them to require that such territory should be brought into the Union no matter how ill adapted its location or the character of its people to the conditions of statehood. But, be that as it may, the right of acquisition under the Constitution seems to be now, and to have been always, universally admitted.

That the question as to whether or not certain territory has been or should be acquired is a political and not a judicial one, to be determined by the political departments of the Government, the executive and the legislative departments and not the judicial, is now too firmly established by the decisions of our highest court to admit of controversy. (United States vs. Reynes, 9 Howard, 127, 154, and cases there cited; Johnson & Graham's lessees vs. McIntosh, 8 Wheaton, 543, 588; Jones vs. United States, 137 U. S., 202, 212, and cases there cited.) The question of the policy of our recent acquisitions I think it is too late to discuss. That the circumstances and conditions surrounding them, at least so far as the Philippine Islands were concerned, were entirely different from those which were presented in the acquisition of Louisiana and the adjacent territory must be admitted. And it may also be admitted that had the circumstances been different we should not have sought them as we did Louisiana. To my mind it is plain, in the face of the conditions presented, that we ought not to, that we could not, have acted otherwise than we have done. And I have not the slightest doubt that if we had we would now be hearing from the other side of this Chamber even fiercer denunciations than those to which we have lately become accustomed: that we would be told how we had basely betrayed those who had trusted us; how we had left them to their former inhuman oppressors or to the selfish greed of other European powers; how we had failed, in the moral obligation resting upon us amongst the nations of the earth, to restore peace and order when we had destroyed their only safeguards; how we had failed in the highest duty which we owed to civilization and progress; how we had failed to grasp and hold that which to us is the commercial opportunity of the centuries; and they would then be extolling the splendid achievements of Jefferson and his party in seizing every opportunity to extend the boundaries of our dominion and the blessings of our civilization as loudly as they now vaguely proclaim the doctrine of the consent of the governed. But the question whether we could act otherwise or not passed beyond the domain of discussion, at least so far as Congress is concerned, upon the adoption of the treaty and the appropriation for carrying it into effect. By that action they became a part of the territory belonging to the United States, and the only thing left for us is to go forward in a manly and straightforward way, with hope and confidence and courage, to the performance of the duties which have devolved upon us.

No one could take any exception to the course of any Senator who, when the treaty was under consideration, opposed its ratification or of a member of the House who, when the appropriation for carrying it into effect was being considered, opposed the grant of the necessary funds, believing in his heart and mind and conscience that we were doing something which we ought not to do. But the treaty having been ratified and carried into effect, not only can no good be accomplished by criticism and fault-finding with what is beyond recall, but no sense of duty can command such a course. On the contrary, every impulse of patriotism ought to prompt every citizen to stand squarely behind those charged with the administration of the Government and lend every aid to the correct and successful solution of the difficulties by which we are confronted. And not only ought he to do this freely and with all his might and main, but to do less is little short of treason. The treaty being ratified and carried into effect, what, then, is the duty of Americans, and especially of those who have the high privilege and duty of a voice in this Capitol? It seems to me there could be but one answer. I ask myself what I would do if I had been amongst those opposed to these acquisitions. I have been able to find but one answer. I would say I have done my duty; I have spoken and voted against this course of action; I have warned my colleagues and my countrymen; but they have not heeded my advice or my warning. They have thought otherwise. They have determined otherwise. The die is cast, and now I stand for my country and with my countrymen against all who would strike at the flag, who are in arms against our authority, wherever they may be. This was the spirit of the brave men who, although opposed politically to Mr. Lincoln, answered his call to arms in 1861. This should be the spirit of the patriot to-day. There can be no middle ground. "Choose you this day whom ye will serve." If your country, shall you not do it fully, unreservedly, unstintedly? Should you not do it in word and deed? Should you not, in the name of humanity and peace, demand that your Government should strike hard and strike home, and should you not be ready to give every assistance to that end? I do not wish to sit in judgment on any other man. I only judge myself. But I do say that when I read the words of that noble hero who has just given to his country the full measure of devotion, I felt that I would not be one of those who, since the ratification and exchange of that treaty, have found no words but those of condemnation for our Government and praise for those in arms against us for all the wealth of all the Indies. I would have felt that every such word had sped a bullet straight to the heart of some American soldier. I would have felt like exclaiming, with the heartbroken, remorse-stricken Macbeth:

> What hands are here! Ha! they pluck out mine eyes.
> Will all great Neptune's ocean wash this blood
> Clean from my hand? No; this my hand will rather
> The multitudinous seas incarnadine,
> Making the green one red.

How admirable the course of the President of the United States in comparison with that of his critics and detractors. Does anyone who knows his pure and exalted life, public and private, suppose for an instant that he is any less actuated by a sense of duty than are they? Can anyone who remembers his readiness in other days to offer his life for the cause of freedom and humanity suppose that he loves liberty any less than these nursery statesmen, who talk about his intention to subvert it and set up a monarchy? Can anyone suppose that he has not as complete and ever-present realization as they of the arduous task which is set before him and us?

Ah, no, Mr. Chairman. He sees all, feels all, understands all, as well as they, and with no less profound sense of duty, with no less stern realization of the magnitude and delicacy of the responsibility, with no less ardent love of liberty and justice. But he approaches that duty with no sign of shirking or evading. He sets about the task slowly and cautiously and tentatively, as well becomes so great an undertaking, but hopefully, courageously. He indulges in no ill-timed, academic, and axiomatic deliverances about liberty, but goes steadily on with the work of establishing and extending, not its theoretical shadow, but its practical and enduring substance. He ought to succeed; he will succeed. He ought to be supported by the American people; he will be supported by them. And when the history of this Administration, this brilliant, this wonderful Administration, comes to be written, like those of Washington and Lincoln, it will stand out bright and shining and glorious in the onward march of the nation; "great in the arduous greatness of things accomplished," remembered ever for its splendid achievements and noble sacrifices, while those who, instead of supporting and assisting it, are censuring or carping and caviling, will be forgotten, or, if remembered, remembered as to this part of their public careers only with sorrow and regret.

For my part, I place myself under the flag, behind the Administration of my country, by the side of the American soldier in whatever land he may be. I believe in my country. I believe in the sincerity of those whom the people have called to guide its destinies. I do not believe there throbs a tyrant heart amongst them. I do not believe there exists anywhere any sentiment or hope or aspiration that does not make for the lifting up of these people whose destiny we have made a part of our own. Believing thus, I look forward, not backward. I ask myself, not what of the past, but what of the future? I would wipe out no footprints that have been made, but make more certain and secure the steps that are yet to be taken.

The power to acquire being admitted, and acquisition being accomplished and complete, we then approach that subject with which we have to deal, the only real, practical question which now remains, the question of their government and control. Of course, the immediate business in hand in the Philippines is the restoration of peace and order. But in Puerto Rico the case is different, and what I shall say to-day is prompted by the knowledge that in a few days we will be called upon to legislate for that island. And we here meet with problems totally different from any which have ever confronted us before, and indeed different from any with which any other government has had to deal. Problems more complex, even, in these islands, with their enormous area and in some of them their savage or semisavage population of many millions, and in all of them a people totally unaccustomed to our institutions, than any ever presented to England in all her broad empire. It should be our endeavor to make no mistakes, or as few as possible. That we have made some mistakes in the past when confronted by new conditions I think few will now deny, and with the warning of these before us it behooves us to move and act cautiously and slowly, and inspired by the feeling that what we do now may affect not only the present but many generations to come. And we should be governed not by any spirit of partisanship or party advantage, but only by that of the loftiest patriotism and the most unselfish devotion to the principles of liberty and humanity.

There is much talk about a protectorate for these islands. To me this would seem to be the widest and most inexcusable departure from the settled policy, upon which we have acted for more than a century, of minding our own business. It is true that we have undertaken a limited quasi protectorate as to our neighbors in this hemisphere, going to the extent of forbidding any European nation to acquire, and extend the European system to, any part of their territory; but this we have done for our own protection, not for theirs, and as essential to our own peace and security, not to theirs. In other words, the Monroe doctrine is in the strictest sense a minding of our own business. We can find no justification or excuse for extending it to the Philippine Islands. To attempt to do so would only make us absurd and absolutely destroy the tenability of that doctrine. If we attempt to extend to them a protectorate in the real meaning of that term, we shall be meddling not only with their affairs, but with the affairs of every other nation with which as an independent sovereignty they may be brought in contact, and thus we shall be obliged to take practical control of their affairs or else constantly expose ourselves to the danger of being embroiled with other nations about matters which they may justly say are none of our concern. Surely there can be no question in the minds of thoughtful men that if we are to have the responsibility of them, it would be best to have at once power equal to that responsibility. But if we make them our own, call them our own, treat them as our own, they and all nations will know to whom to look and with whom to reckon, and whatever we may do with them or in them or about them will be our own business and nobody else's. We have not yet gone into the business of acting as general guardian for all the weak and incapable tribes and peoples of the earth, and I hope we never shall. But wherever our flag floats there it is the symbol of our protection, our power, and our responsibility.

Holding them as our own, there ought to be no question amongst reasonable men as to our duty to their people. The spirit of our Government, the genius of our people, point the way.

That we should lead them to civilization and fit them for self-government; that we should at the beginning confer upon them such measure of self-government as their character and past and present environment will admit; that we should gradually from time to time increase that measure of self-government; that in the years to come we should bring them, if it be possible, to that condition of practical independence enjoyed by Canada and Australia with reference to Great Britain; and for my part I hope and look for the day to come when, reserving to ourselves only such points of advantage as shall be necessary for the maintenance of our commercial and international interests, we shall grant them actual independence, if they shall desire it and shall prove themselves fit for it and able to maintain it. How far off that time may be no man can now determine. That they will ever, after they have for a time enjoyed in their fertile and prolific soil, and in the soft air and under the brilliant skies of their beautiful climate, all the blessings of liberty and law, after they have found under the flag of this great Republic a safety and security and sweetness in life of which they have never dreamed before, desire to depart from its protection and set up an independent government and flag of their own I do not believe. But that we should, if it be possible, guide and lead them to the capacity to do so, if they shall wish to, is to my mind our clear duty, as it should be our unceasing endeavor. Some people seem to talk about holding these possessions as dependencies or colonies as though it was unworthy of us and degrading to them. They seem to forget that right upon our northern border there are a people as free and as liberty loving and brave as we are who occupy that relation to Great Britain. They seem to forget that for nearly two centuries we were in that condition ourselves, and that but for that apprenticeship we probably would not have been fit for the task which we have had to perform. But the business in hand now is to govern and control them as we find them. It is for us to meet our responsibilities and leave those who come after us to meet theirs.

That we shall abide by and enforce those great principles of liberty and natural justice and right, which are, as it were, bred in the bone of our race and inseparably a part of our traditions and of our habits of thought and action, I do not think any will deny, unless it be a rare one here and there who having found under our institutions a liberty and freedom unknown elsewhere is now engaged in the self-imposed task of teaching us how to preserve them. But that we shall be obliged in the outset to establish in these islands a government in some respects different from any we have ever before adopted for any portion of our territory I do not doubt. The judicial system will probably have to be in some respects different from our own. No people can be fit for that participation in the administration of justice to which under our system every American is accustomed, without years, perhaps generations, of training in the habits of freedom and self-restraint and in that spirit which stands, above everything, for law and order, and which dreads, above all else, the pollution of the fountains of justice. The revenue laws and commercial regulations may have to be different from our own. There may be other things as to which we may have to adopt different principles and policies from those heretofore pursued by us. Surely at first we will have to govern with a firm, strong hand.

Let us, then, approach this problem from this standpoint and with the objects to which I have referred in view. At the very outset it is a matter of the greatest importance that we should determine whether in dealing with these dependencies we are bound, by reason of our written Constitution, by certain paper limitations by which other nations—as, for instance, Great Britain—are not bound. At the very outset in such legislation as we undertake we must determine this question, and sooner or later the courts must also decide it. While these limitations may not be and, I think, are not insuperable obstacles to success, yet it must be evident that, if we are not bound by them, the chances of success will be much greater in the greater freedom of action which we will enjoy. There have appeared recently in the magazines and the public press of the country articles by eminent constitutional lawyers, professors of law, and publicists of the greatest learning and research, on both sides of this question. I desire here to express my indebtedness to these articles, and to say that I have not hesitated to adopt those views which I consider sound, and to use their language when it has appeared to me most apt to express the proper and exact meaning. I have given to them and to the Constitution and the decisions of the Supreme Court thereon the closest examination possible in the time at my disposal, and I purpose to give to the House the result of that examination and the conclusions I have drawn therefrom. I shall not discuss, then, the character of the people of these islands or the form of government best suited to them or what rights and privileges ought to be granted to them or withheld from them; but how far, in whatever legislation may be considered best for them, the Congress of the United States is free to deal with them, and whether the limitations of the Constitution apply.

I.

Let us first turn to the Constitution.

In the first place it is necessary for us (and the Supreme Court will find it necessary) to come to a clear and fixed determination of the meaning of the term "United States" as used in the Constitution.

The preamble begins, "We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union," etc., and ends, "do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

"We, the people of the United States." What people? What people ordained and established it? What does the term "United States" mean here? The Constitution framed and proposed by the Federal Convention was ordained and established, or, as we might express it, enacted into law, by the people of the several States acting through their respective representative conventions. Ratification by the conventions of nine States was sufficient for its establishment between the States so ratifying it. (Article VII.) The people of the western territory, which had prior to that time been ceded by certain of the States to the United States, united under the Articles of Confederation, or which had been acknowledged by Great Britain as belonging to the United States, had no part in its adoption. Furthermore, Article V provided that amendments might be proposed and adopted, and that they should become valid as a part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures or by conventions of three-fourths of the States united under it. And each amendment which has been adopted has become, as it was intended it should be, a part of the organic law, as prescribed by that law, by the action of three-fourths of the States so united.

In no case have the people outside of the limits of the States had any voice or part in making such amendments. "People of the United States" could, then, mean nothing else than the people of the States which should ratify it or amend it, acting severally in their State conventions or legislatures. If they had said, "We, the people of the United States, respectively" (they could not say, "We, the people of the thirteen States, respectively," for it was uncertain how many States would adopt it), the sense in which the words "United States" was used would have been precisely the same. There can be no doubt, then, that the term "United States," first used in the preamble of the Constitution, must mean the States collectively within which resided the people who should establish it or amend it; and that in this its collective sense it must comprise the territory within those States, and none other.

It is, then, the people of the States who ordain and establish. And what do they ordain and establish? "This Constitution for the United States of America." "This charter of government," for what? For the people of States who should not adopt it? Certainly not. For the States which should adopt and for the territory and its people belonging to the United States? If certain of the States had refused to adopt it a question might have arisen, certainly would have arisen, as to who was the owner of that territory. Certainly it could not have this meaning. The only answer, then, can be, for the States, collectively, which shall adopt it, if there shall be nine of them, and for those which may thereafter be admitted to the Union, all forming together when thus united that sovereign nation which, when the requisite number of States shall have ratified and adopted, will be hereby created.

The term "United States" in the preamble, then, can have but one meaning, the collective name of the States, and under this name comprising the territory embraced within those States, and no more. By no possible twisting or turning of the language and its context can it be given that wider meaning, having its equivalent in the word "Empire" in England, and thus embracing all the territory, the States, and that outside the States as well, over which the sovereignty of the United States extends. And this would seem to settle the question, for it is the preamble that shows by whom, for whom, and for what purpose the Constitution was adopted. If the Constitution was adopted by the people of the States united under it, and for those States, then it would seem to be self-evident that it and its limitations could only apply to those people and to those States. By it a nation was created with all the powers of a nation among nations. Among these powers would inevitably be that of acquiring territory. Such territory having been acquired would belong to the United States, and must be governed and controlled. Its framers realized this, and also that the power to govern such territory would be as broad as the power to acquire. But in order that there might be no question about the matter, after providing for the powers of the Government of this nation made up of the States united under it with reference to those States, and placing certain checks and inhibitions upon it in reference to the States, and upon those States with reference to it, they went on to provide, in the third section of the fourth article, that the representatives of the sovereignty of that nation—the Congress—should make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory belonging to that nation. Note the words "belonging to." Territory might belong to that nation and yet not be a part of the nation; its people subject to the Government and control of that nation and yet not a part of the supreme governing power.

Passing now from the preamble to the body of the Constitution and its amendments, we find that this term is used seventy times, in such phrases as the following: "Congress of the United States," "President of the United States," "Citizens of the United States," "The judicial power of the United States," "Treason against the United States," "All persons born or naturalized in the United States," "Officers of the United States," "Common defense and general welfare of the United States," "Within the United States," "Throughout the United States," etc. I will append a note giving all of these phrases and their references. a

Insurrection or rebellion against the United States. (Fourteenth amendment, sec. 4.)
Shall not be denied or abridged by the United States. (Fifteenth amendment, sec. 1.)

Examining these with reference to the context, it will be found that in all of them, with the possible exception of three, the term "United States" has the same meaning as in the preamble, or is used as the name of the sovereignty or nation created by the Constitution and made up of the several States united under it in the Federal Union, or, in other words, to designate the Federal sovereign, and can have no other meaning. These three are the following: "Throughout the United States," "Within the United States," and "All persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof."

Now, it would seem that it would have to be presumed that if, as we have seen, the term "United States," as used in the preamble and in all the other phrases in the Constitution, has one or the other of the two meanings above given, to wit, (1) collective or United States, (2) Federal sovereign, it would also have one or the other of those two meanings as used in these three phrases. And but for what has been said by the judges of the Supreme Court in certain of their opinions, I hardly think there would be any question as to the conclusiveness of this presumption. These opinions we will consider hereafter. Let us examine these phrases now only in the light of the Constitution itself, the context and the scope and object of the whole instrument and its various parts.

The phrase "Within the United States," as noted above, occurs once in the original Constitution (Art. II, sec. 1, subs. 4). That subsection prescribes what persons shall be eligible to the office of President: First, a natural-born citizen (the meaning of this we will have to consider hereafter); second, a citizen of the United States at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, though he should not be a natural-born citizen. And as to any one of this latter class, the last clause of this subsection further prescribes that he shall have been fourteen years a resident "within the United States." Suppose only nine of the States had ratified the Constitution, could there be any doubt as to the meaning of the term "United States?" This question puts it beyond doubt that the meaning is the first above given, for we are obliged to remember that the outside territory would not then have even belonged to the States ratifying, but would have had to be the subject of negotiation, and as the result of that negotiation might have gone to the nonratifying States. The phrase also occurs in the thirteenth amendment. There the term can have no other than the same meaning, if the words which follow, "or any place subject to their jurisdiction," are to have any meaning whatever. Indeed, does not the wording of this amendment show that its authors understood that the term "United States," when used to express extent of territory, had no other meaning than that first above given?

The phrase "throughout the United States" is used three times, each time in the original Constitution. As used in subsection 3 of section 1 of Article II, the term "United States" can have no other meaning than the first, for it relates to the time of choosing electors and the day on which they shall give their votes, and electors are not chosen except by the States which compose the United States. Would not this, taken in connection with the evident meaning of the term elsewhere in so many places and in so many different connections, furnish an almost conclusive presumption that it has the same meaning when used in Article I, section 8, subsections 1 and 4. And I think, in the light of the context and of the scope and object of the whole Constitution, and particularly of the whole of this section of the first article, which I shall presently consider, that presumption is made absolutely conclusive.

In the phrase "all persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof" we would argue from the facts above that, as the term has no other meaning elsewhere in the Constitution than one of the two above given, the same must be the case here, and if it has either meaning it must have the first. But aside from this the words following, "citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside," would seem to show that the authors of the amendment contemplated only the States, and this view is further emphasized by the language of the thirteenth amendment, to which I have alluded, which was fresh in their minds and which some of them had helped to frame. Besides, the amendment consisted mainly of prohibitions against the States, and the whole of it resulted from the conditions existing after the civil war, and was intended to secure its results and to give certain rights to persons of African descent residing in the States, and to prevent the States from taking away those rights. [Applause.]

Now, if the term "United States" in the Constitution has only one or the other of the two meanings above given, wherever it occurs in that instrument, then it would inevitably follow that the limitations of the Constitution, except those containing positive and express prohibitions, do not extend beyond the limits of the States united by and under it, except so far as they may have been extended by the action of Congress.

In what I have to say hereafter let the exceptions above referred to be borne always in mind. There the inhibition is against any legislation by Congress at all, either in the United States or in the territory belonging thereto. As to those things, it can pass no law. But where it can legislate, either by express grant in the Constitution or by necessary implication, then what I have to say as to the limitations imposed upon it applies.

II.

Let us now turn to and examine, in the light of the circumstances of their adoption and of the objects sought to be accomplished, those provisions of the Constitution conferring power upon Congress and restricting the power so conferred which can affect in any way the subject now under discussion.

Considering the Constitution as a whole, we find that its framers were first and mainly concerned with the creation and organization of the three great departments of Government—the legislative, the executive, and the judicial. Article I creates and organizes and defines most of the powers of the legislative department, Article II the executive, and Article III the judicial. They always remembered, however, and we must always remember, that it was a Federal Constitution they were making; a Constitution, it is true, creating a sovereign nation, but still a Federal Constitution. By it there was to be a partition of the sovereignty which the people of the several States would have exercised if, instead of adopting it, they had separated into different and distinct nations. By it the people of each State were to vest in the new sovereignty created by the Constitution a portion of their sovereignty. By it, in all internal and domestic relations, each State was to possess the powers of sovereignty originally vested in its people, except such as the Constitution should specifically grant to the Federal Government; in all external and international relations, and in all those concerns which could not without inevitable conflict and confusion be left to the States, every sovereign power originally vested in the States not expressly prohibited by the Constitution, and all the incidental powers necessarily implied therein, were vested in the new sovereignty.

Moreover the Federal Government was to exercise certain powers operating directly upon the people of the several States, such as the power of taxation and such powers relative to the general welfare as could best be exercised by a general government. Hence, as to the legislative department, it became necessary to make the grants and restrictions contained in the eighth, ninth, and tenth sections of Article I and in Article III of the Constitution.

In these we find the following:

(1) A specific enumeration of powers which would have been exercised by each of the States if, instead of adopting the Constitution, they had separated and had become thirteen separate and independent nations, but which are conferred upon the legislative body of the nation to be exercised by it. (Article I, section 8; Article III.)

(2) Certain prohibitions and restrictions upon Congress in the exercise of the powers so conferred. (Article I, section 9; Article III section 2.)

(3) A prohibition to the States as to the exercise of certain powers, making those conferred upon Congress and prohibited to the States exclusive in Congress. (Article I, section 10.)

Of the remainder of Article I and of the whole of Article II, no part has any reference or application or can have any reference or application to any territory outside of the limits of the States. As to Article III, the practice of the legislative department of the Government and the decisions of the Supreme Court, beginning with Seré vs. Pitot in 6 Cranch and coming uniformly down, have put it beyond question that it has no reference or application to territory outside the States.

Seré vs. Pitot, 6 Cranch, 332; American Insurance Company vs. Canter, 1 Peters, 511; Benner vs. Porter, 9 How., 235; Clinton vs. Englebrecht, 13 Wallace, 434; Reynolds vs. United States, 98 U. S., 145; City of Panama, 101 U. S., 453; McAlister vs. United States, 141 U. S., 174.

The fact that no partition was to be made of the powers of sovereignty in territory outside the limits of the States would seem to make it apparent that section 8, so far as regards its main object and scope, could have no application to such territory, for there could be no object in specifying and defining powers where every sovereign power of legislation existed. Besides, one of the incidental objects of this section was to provide security that the United States, in the exercise of its powers, should treat all the States alike; otherwise a majority of States might combine to oppress a minority. Hence the provision of this section as to uniformity of duties, imposts, and excises throughout the United States. I have already given reasons for holding that the term "United States" in the expression "throughout the United States" as used in two subsections of this section, must mean the collective name of the States, embracing only the territory within the States, and that view is strengthened and confirmed by this consideration of the scope and object of the whole section. The legislative and executive departments are sovereign in their nature, it being by them alone that the sovereignty of the United States could declare or execute its will. Congress, representing that sovereignty, undivided as to the territories, would have full legislative powers as to them, without any grant to that effect from the States. And hence it would be absurd to hold that the grant of power had any reference to the Territories. A fortiori it would be absurd to say that the limitations of the grant have a more extensive operation than the grant itself.

The object of section 9 is to place certain restrictions and prohibitions on Congress, and the object of the limitations therein contained was therefore the same as that of the limitations contained in section 8, and could not have a wider operation than those limitations. Two of the subsections, on their face, are to be operative within the States, and the limitation as to the apportionment of direct taxes has a similar object to that of the limitation in section 8 as to uniformity of imposts, etc.—that is, to prevent a minority of wealthy States from having an unreasonably greater part of the burdens of government thrown upon them by a less wealthy majority.

The limitations in section 10 are upon the States. And we must note here, as to these limitations and all other limitations wherein the word "State" is used, that that word as used in the Constitution refers only to one of the members of the Union, as has been held by the Supreme Court over and over again. Internationally and in treaties it may mean any political entity whose foreign and international affairs and relations are conducted and controlled by the General Government. But in the Constitution its meaning is one of the States of the Union. (Hepburn vs. Ellzey, 2 Cranch, 445; New Orleans vs. Winter, 1 Wheaton, 91; Loughborough vs. Blake, 5 Wheaton, 317; Barney vs. Baltimore, 6 Wallace, 280; Geoffroy vs. Riggs, 133 U. S., 258.)

In Hepburn vs. Ellzey (2 Cranch, at page 452) Chief Justice Marshall, delivering the opinion of the court, says:

"On the part of the plaintiff it has been urged that Columbia is a distinct political society; and is, therefore, 'a State,' according to the definition of writers on general law.

"This is true. But as the act of Congress obviously used the word 'State' in reference to that term as used in the Constitution, it becomes necessary to inquire whether Columbia is a State in the sense of that instrument. The result of that examination is a conviction that the members of the American Confederacy only are the States contemplated in the Constitution.

"The House of Representatives is to be composed of members chosen by the people of the several States; and each State shall have at least one Representative.

"The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State.

"Each State shall appoint, for the election of the Executive, a number of electors equal to its whole number of Senators and Representatives.

"These clauses show that the word State is used in the Constitution as designating a member of the Union, and excludes from the term the significance attached to it by writers on the law of nations.

"When the same term which has been used plainly in this limited sense in the articles respecting the legislative and executive departments is also employed in that which respects the judicial department, it must be understood as retaining the sense originally given to it."

In Geoffroy vs. Riggs (133 U. S., at page 268) Justice Field, delivering the opinion of the court, says:

"This article is not happily drawn. It leaves in doubt what is meant by 'States of the Union.' Ordinarily these terms would be held to apply to those political communities exercising various attributes of sovereignty which compose the United States as distinguished from the organized municipalities known as Territories and the District of Columbia. And yet, separate communities with an independent local government are often described as States, though the extent of their political sovereignty be limited by relations to a more general government or to other countries. The term is used in general jurisprudence and by writers on public law as denoting organized political societies with an established government. Within this definition the District of Columbia, under the Government of the United States, is as much a State as any of those political communities which compose the United States. Were there no other Territory under the Government of the United States, it would not be questioned that the District of Columbia would be a State within the meaning of international law, and it is not perceived that it is any less a State within that meaning because other States and other Territories are also under the same Government. In Hepburn vs. Ellzey (2 Cranch, 445, 452) the question arose whether a resident and a citizen of the District of Columbia could sue a citizen of Virginia in the circuit court of the United States. The court, by Chief Justice Marshall, in deciding the questions, conceded that the District of Columbia was a distinct political society, and therefore a State, according to the definition of writers on general law, but held that the act of Congress in providing for controversies between citizens of different States in the circuit court referred to that term as used in the Constitution, and therefore to one of the States composing the United States. A similar concession, that the District of Columbia being a separate political community, is, in a certain sense, a State, is made by this court in a recent case of Metropolitan Railroad Company vs. District of Columbia (132 U. S., 1, 9), decided at the present term."

It would seem, from what I have said, to be reasonably certain that the limitations upon the powers granted to the General Government in the original Constitution were not intended to operate beyond the limits of the States united under it. But a consideration of the specific grant contained in the fourth article, following all these grants and limitations, will, in my judgment, put it beyond doubt. It is this:

The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States, etc. (Article IV, section 3, subsection 2.)

Here there is no qualification or limitation. If the Constitution had not been adopted and the States had separated into different and distinct nationalities, the territory recognized by Great Britain as belonging to the United States, and that ceded by certain of the States to the United States under the Articles of Confederation, would have belonged to all of the States, and would necessarily have had to be divided between them, or be the subject of negotiation and treaty between the different States after separation.

The Constitution being adopted, this territory (or a part of it, the number of States adopting being greater than nine and less than thirteen) belonged to the States united by and under it, and would have to be disposed of and governed by the government created by it. Besides, other territory might be acquired under the great national powers of that instrument. Therefore the relations between the Federal Government and the States, by the grants of power and the restrictions of that power in the preceding articles of the Constitution, being disposed of, this grant of power was made. And in view of the fact that by the Constitution was to be created a sovereign nation, made up of the States composing it, and with no divided powers of sovereignty as to the Territories, and in view of the further fact that the framers of the Constitution could not possibly forecast the circumstances and conditions which might attend any future acquisition of territory, it must be apparent that this grant must be absolutely unrestricted, and that its exercise must be left to the untrammeled judgment and discretion of the representatives of the national sovereignty, and that the framers of the Constitution so intended.

Such were the grants of power and the restrictions thereon as they existed in the Constitution as originally framed and submitted to the States for their ratification or rejection. When it came to be considered by the States, objection was made from many quarters that its limitations did not sufficiently safeguard the States against an improper exercise by the General Government of the great powers which had been conferred. This objection was urged with such effect as to endanger its ratification by a sufficient number of the States, and such ratification would probably not have been secured had not assurances been given that the first ten amendments would be at once proposed and ingrafted upon it. Accordingly the first ten amendments were proposed and submitted to the legislatures of the several States by the First Congress September 25, 1789. Thus, in considering their effect and the proper construction to be put upon them, they may be considered as though they had been originally adopted by the Federal Convention and made a part of the original articles, to wit, section 9 of Article I, and Article III, and what I have said as to the limitations in these articles apply equally to these amendments.

The eleventh and twelfth amendments need not be considered here, as they have no bearing upon the subject under discussion.

The last three amendments grew out of the conditions existing at the close of the civil war and were intended to secure its results. The thirteenth forbids slavery "within the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction." The fourteenth in its first section defines who are citizens of the United States and places certain restrictions on the States. The other provisions are aimed at the States. This is made clear by considering the express words of the whole amendment, and particularly the prohibition contained in the first section, that no State should "deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." That the general prohibition to that effect contained in the fifth amendment would not bind the States, as had been uniformly held by the Supreme Court, was known to the framers of this amendment, and so they put in these words as a protection to those persons for whose benefit and protection it was proposed and adopted.

I shall hereafter allude to these decisions in another connection as sustaining the views here contended for. This amendment was proposed by the next Congress after that which proposed the thirteenth, and with that amendment and its peculiar language before them, and so was adopted by the States. In it were used the words, "All persons born or naturalized in the United States," without any words, like those in the thirteenth, showing that it was to have any wider application than to the States united under the Constitution, and the words "citizens of the United States and of the States wherein they reside" were used without any words suggesting that any persons are citizens of the United States within the meaning of the Constitution except as they are such by having been citizens of one of the States, or by being made such by operation of the laws of Congress. The words "and subject to the jurisdiction thereof" were evidently intended, as has been held by the Supreme Court (United States vs. Wong Kim Ark, 169 U. S., 649), to exclude from its operation the children of ministers, and others in similar circumstances, born in this country. The fifteenth forbids the disfranchisement by either the States or the United States of citizens of the United States on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Thus we see there is nothing in any of the amendments, either the first ten or those subsequently adopted, which can change the conclusions arrived at from a consideration of the original Constitution; that is, that the term "United States" has, in the Constitution, wherever it is used, one of the two meanings above given, and no other; that the limitations placed upon the powers granted were intended to apply only as to the action of the General Government in its dealing with the States or their people; and that the grant contained in the fourth article was absolutely unrestricted by those limitations, and the power therein conferred was left to the judgment and discretion of Congress.

III.

The conclusion above arrived at would be easily reached, both by Congress and by the courts, and, indeed, it would seem that no other could be reached, if we approached the conditions presented by our recent acquisitions only in the light of the Constitution itself. But, as I have said before, there are a number of opinions of the Supreme Court in which expressions have been used which seem to indicate an opposite view. These, I think I shall be able to show, are mere dicta, and therefore not binding as authority in the consideration of subsequent cases.

Let us now consider these cases. The first one I call attention to is that of Loughborough vs. Blake. (5 Wheaton, 317.) The case was this: Congress had passed an act laying an annual direct tax of $6,000,000 upon the United States and had, as required by the Constitution (Article I, section 9, subsection 4), apportioned that tax among the States. Subsequently Congress passed another act extending the first act to the District of Columbia. The plaintiff claimed exemption from this tax on the ground that the act thus extending the tax to the District was unconstitutional. What the effect of the decision was is shown by the learned reporter's headnote or syllabus to the case. It was this: That Congress has authority to impose a direct tax on the District in proportion to the census directed to be taken by the Constitution; that the power of Congress to levy and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises is coextensive with the territory of the United States; that the power of Congress to exercise exclusive jurisdiction in all cases whatsoever within the District includes the power of taxing it. This was all, as the reporter viewed it, that the decision meant; and if this had been all that the learned judge who delivered the opinion of the court had said, it would not now be necessary to refer to the case. But in the course of the opinion he used words having a much wider and more far-reaching import and which, if they had been necessary to the conclusion reached, would, unless subsequently modified or reversed, settle the question now under consideration.

If the Chief Justice had said in the beginning of the opinion, as he did in the latter part of it, that under the power of exercising "exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever within this District," Congress had, within the District, all the power that it had in any State and in addition the power of the legislature of a State and therefore had an unqualified power of taxation, without regard to representation by the District in Congress, and that in case that power was exercised the Constitution furnished a rule or standard by which the share of the burden might be justly and equally determined and applied, that would have ended the matter, and the decision would have been what it was, no more and no less. But for some reason, it is hard to say what, he thought it proper, in the first part of the opinion, to go further and say what was not at all necessary to the conclusion reached, and which might have been omitted without in any way affecting that conclusion. Accordingly he went on to use those words, which seem to indicate that the position which I have taken is unsound, as follows:

> This grant is general without limitation as to place. It consequently extends to all places over which the Government extends. If this could be doubted, the doubt is removed by the subsequent words which modify the grant. These words are, "but all duties and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States." It will not be contended that the modification of the power extends to places to which the power itself does not extend. The power then to lay and collect duties, imposts, and excises may be exercised, and must be exercised throughout the United States. Does this term designate the whole, or any particular portion of the American Empire? Certainly this question can admit of but one answer. It is the name given to our great Republic, which is composed of States and Territories. The District of Columbia, or the territory west of the Missouri, is not less within the United States than Maryland or Pennsylvania; and it is not less necessary on the principles of our Constitution that uniformity in the imposition of imposts, duties, and excises should be observed in the one than in the other.

It must be apparent from the statement of the case and from the latter part of the opinion to which I have referred before that this was in nowise necessary to the decision, and that it must therefore be taken as a mere dictum.

Let us see whether this dictum is sound and should be followed. It can not be contended that the grant of the power of taxation is not general or is limited as to place. And it must follow that it extends to all places over which the jurisdiction of the United States extends. There can be no question as to the extent of the power. The question is, however, not as to the power, but as to the modification of the power. And right here is the fault of the reasoning of the Chief Justice. Of course, no one would contend that the modification of the power extends to places to which the power does not itself extend. But it may be contended, and is contended, that the power extends to places to which the modification does not extend.

The power is to lay and collect duties, imposts, and excises.

This power may be exercised wherever the jurisdiction of the Government extends. The modification is that such duties, imposts, and excises must be uniform throughout the United States. But it does not necessarily follow from this that this modification must extend wherever the power extends, to territory outside the States united under the Constitution, but which is subject to the jurisdiction of the Government as well as to the United States proper. It is true that the term "United States" may in popular usage and internationally be used to designate the whole "American empire," yet in the Constitution it is used again and again with the two other meanings given above, and, indeed, seems nowhere in that instrument to have been given this meaning. This did not seem to have occurred to the Chief Justice at the time, nor the further fact that in the first act Congress had given it another meaning.

Besides, there is a very striking inconsistency between the statement that "it is not less necessary, on the principles of our Constitution, that uniformity in the imposition of imposts, etc., should be observed in the one than in the other;" that is, in the Territories than in the States, and what he says subsequently in the same connection as to apportionment of direct taxes. The Constitution does not less require apportionment as to direct taxes than it does uniformity as to indirect taxes or imposts, etc. Yet, while he says it is necessary to exercise the power to lay indirect taxes in the Territories if we exercise it in the States, and that we must do it uniformly, he also says we need not exercise the power to lay direct taxes and apportion them in the Territories unless we choose to; that we may lay direct taxes and apportion them to the States, but we are not obliged to extend and apportion them to the Territories at all.

Yet the obligation of apportionment to the Territories, if there be such, exists as much, under the principles of our Constitution, as does the obligation of uniformity. Would it not necessarily follow, if he is correct in his first proposition, that he must be incorrect in the second? And if the obligation of apportionment does not extend to the Territories, would it not necessarily follow that the obligation of uniformity also does not extend to the Territories? And would not the necessity and desirability be determined in each case by the relative conditions existing in the States and in the Territories, or any part of them, according to the judgment of Congress? Surely there can be but one answer. [Applause.]

It may be further observed that the grant of legislative power over the District is contained in Article I, along with the other grants of power conferred by the States, and might be regarded as limited by the same restrictions as the other grants therein contained, and especially as the District was at the time of the adoption of the Constitution a part of two of the States, whereas the plenary grant of power over the Territories is found in a subsequent article (Article IV) and contains nothing to indicate any restriction.

Having pointed out that this part of the decision is a mere dictum, and having shown the inconsistencies in that dictum, I now point out that not only has the case never since been cited as sustaining this assertion of the learned Chief Justice, but, on the contrary, as to this assertion, it has, in a subsequent case, been substantially overruled in an opinion delivered by the same judge. The case is American Insurance Company vs. Canter (1 Peters, 511). In that case Mr. Webster, one of the counsel, in the argument used these words, at page 538:

> What is Florida? It is no part of the United States. How can it be? How is it represented? Do the laws of the United States reach Florida? Not unless by particular provisions.
> The Territory and all within it are to be governed by the acquiring power, except where there are reservations by treaty.
>
> By the law of England, when possession is taken of territories the King, jure coronæ, has the power of legislation until Parliament shall interfere. Congress has the jus coronæ in this case, and Florida was to be governed by Congress as she thought proper.
> What has Congress done? She might have done anything. She might have refused the trial by jury and refused a legislature. She has given a legislature, to be exercised at her will, and a government of a mixed nature, in which she has endeavored to distinguish between State and United States jurisdiction, anticipating the future erection of the Territory into a State.
>
> Does the law establishing the court at Key West come within the restrictions of the Constitution of the United States? If the Constitution does not extend over this Territory, the law can not be inconsistent with the National Constitution.

And in the opinion the Chief Justice says, at page 545:

> We have only to pursue this subject one step further to perceive that this provision of the Constitution does not apply to it. The next sentence declares that "the judges of both the Supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behavior." The judges of the supreme courts of Florida hold their office for four years. These courts are not constitutional courts, in which the judicial power conferred by the Constitution on the General Government can be deposited. They are incapable of receiving it. They are legislative courts, created in virtue of the general right of sovereignty which exists in the Government, or in virtue of that clause which enables Congress to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory belonging to the United States. The jurisdiction with which they are invested is not a part of that judicial power which is defined in the third article of the Constitution, but is conferred by Congress in the exercise of those general powers which that body possesses over the Territories of the United States. Although admiralty jurisdiction can be exercised in the States in those courts only which are established in pursuance of the third article of the Constitution, the same limitation does not extend to the Territories. In legislating for them Congress exercises the combined powers of the General and of a State government.

Here are the two great expounders of the Constitution, the great judge and the great lawyer and advocate, each of them perhaps the greatest man in his particular sphere of action that has ever lived. We all know that the bench and the bar mutually act and react on each other—a good bar, a good bench; a good bench, a good bar. And who knows but that these two great minds each affected and influenced and stimulated the other, so that the one became the greatest judge of our country and the other the greatest lawyer and orator.

The judge in this opinion says nothing to indicate any disapproval of Mr. Webster's language, and I am at a loss to understand how he could say what he did without entirely approving it, and what he did say is directly against what was said in Loughborough vs. Blake as to the meaning of the term "United States" as used in the Constitution. Mr. Webster maintained to his dying day, always and everywhere, the position here taken, at the bar and in the Senate. We find him as late as 1848 still maintaining it in a debate with Mr. Calhoun, in which the advantage was clearly on the side of the great lawyer, and again later on, in a speech in answer to Mr. Berrien, of Georgia, making use of these words:

> As to the power of Congress I have nothing to add to what I said the other day. Congress has full power over the subject. It may establish any such government and any such laws in the Territories as, in its discretion, it may see fit. It is subject, of course, to the rules of justice and propriety; but it is under no constitutional restraint.

And Mr. Benton ridiculed the idea of the Constitution extending to the Territories as the doctrine of "the transmigration of the Constitution."

And there is nothing in the case of Cross vs. Harrison (16 Howard, 164) in conflict with the view here contended for. In that case it was held that duties on foreign goods imported into San Francisco were lawfully demanded and collected by the civil governor appointed by the President while the war continued and afterwards from the ratification of the treaty of peace until the revenue system of the United States was put into operation in California under the acts of Congress passed for that purpose. So far from holding that the Constitution would extend ex proprio vigore to such territory, it might be said to indicate the contrary; for from the time of the ratification of the treaty until the governor received notice of it (more than two months) duties were collected as prescribed by the tariff, prescribed and enforced during the military occupation, and not as prescribed by the tariff act of the United States, and this was sustained by the court.

It should always be noted in considering the case of Cross vs. Harrison that no point was made by counsel or considered by the court as to the rates of duty being different in California from what they were in the United States. The principal point made, and considered by the court, was that after the acquisition of California by the treaty and before a law was passed making it a collection district and providing for a collector there was no authority to prevent the landing of foreign goods or to charge duties upon them. In other words, that our revenue laws covered only so much of the territory of the United States as had been divided into collection districts, the contention going to the extent of claiming that out of such collection districts there was no authority to prevent the landing of goods or to charge duties on them, even though such landing had been made within the territorial limits of the United States. (It was assumed that the port of San Francisco was within the territorial limits of the United States.) And it was in passing on this contention that those expressions in the opinion were used which are being relied on by those taking the opposite view from that at which I have arrived. Surely this case will not be considered an authority by the courts in a case where the question to be considered will be the constitutional power of Congress in territory belonging to the United States, but which, it is contended, is not a part of the United States within the meaning of the Constitution, and in which the court's attention will be particularly directed to the last proposition and an opinion thereon demanded as absolutely necessary to its proper decision.

Let me not be misunderstood as to this matter of revenue legislation. That direct taxation for purposes of the General Government will again be resorted to I do not think now enters the mind of any member, and even if it should be resorted to, it is not to be supposed that it will be extended to these islands, or, if extended, that it will be applied except by the rule of equal and just apportionment. The direct taxes which they will have to pay will be for the support of their local governments and to cover their local expenditures; and those taxes will, so far as they are controlled by our legislation, be made equal and uniform upon their people. As to tariff legislation, this, too, will be made uniform as to these islands and their people; but the conditions existing there and here, and our commercial policy, may make it necessary that there shall be one tariff for them and another for us, and it is the power to thus legislate that I am contending for. It is hardly to be supposed that their tariff rates will be greater than ours, or even as great; on the contrary, it would seem that they could and ought to be made much less.

I next refer to the case of Callan vs. Wilson (127 U. S., 540). In that case the plaintiff had been tried and convicted, in the District of Columbia, for the crime of conspiracy, without a jury, which he had demanded. He sued out a writ of habeas corpus, on the ground that he was restrained of his liberty in violation of the Constitution, in that he had been refused the right of a trial by jury. That contention was sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States, and he was discharged from custody. This decision was as to the District of Columbia, and can be distinguished on four grounds, either of which would seem to be conclusive, and show that the same would not be the holding as to the Territories: First, the grant of legislative power over the District is contained in Article I of the Constitution, along with the other grants of power conferred by the States, and was intended to be limited by the same restrictions as the other grants therein contained, whereas, the plenary grant of power over the Territories is found in a subsequent article and contains nothing to indicate any restriction; second, the grant contemplates the transfer of territory and people then within certain States to the United States, for the purpose of a seat of government, and the conclusion is irresistible that the States desired and intended to secure for this territory and its people the same protection as for the States themselves; third, the Constitution once extended over it, and has never ceased to extend over it; fourth, by the act of February 21, 1871, the Constitution and laws of the United States were specifically extended to the District of Columbia.

It is true the learned judge, Justice Harlan, in the opinion, says, at page 550:

> In Reynolds vs. United States (98 U. S., 145, 154) it was taken for granted that the sixth amendment to the Constitution secured to the people of the Territories the right of trial by jury in criminal prosecutions; and it had been previously held in Webster vs. Reid (11 How., 437, 460) that the seventh amendment secured to them a like right in civil actions at common law. We can not think that the people of this District have, in that regard, less rights than those accorded to the people of the Territories of the United States.

But it will be noticed that the point as to whether the Constitution and its limitations extend ex proprio vigore to the Territories was not raised in Reynolds vs. United States. Indeed, it could not be raised in that case, for the Constitution had been specifically extended to the Territory of Utah by act of Congress (9 U. S. Stats., chap. 51, sec. 17, p. 458). And in the case of Webster vs. Reid it was not decided that the seventh amendment applied to the Territories (although it was quoted, it is true), but it was stated that the provisions of that amendment had been extended to the Territory of Iowa by the organic law of that Territory.

It may be said further of Reynolds vs. United States that the contention was that the act of Congress defining bigamy in the Territories and providing for its punishment, which act was intended for the suppression of polygamy in Utah, was in conflict with the first amendment to the Constitution in that it prohibited the free exercise of religion. The decision of the court on this point was that the law was not against that amendment, because it did no such thing. But if this matter is to be determined by dicta in the opinions of the judges, then the whole question is still an open one, for in the case of American Publishing Company vs. Fisher (166 U. S., 464), which is quoted with approval in Springville vs. Thomas, in the same volume, Justice Brewer, delivering the opinion, says, at pages 466, 467:

> The Territorial statute was relied upon as authority for this action. Its validity, therefore, must be determined. Whether the seventh amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which provides that "in suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed $20, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved," operates ex proprio vigore to invalidate this statute, may be a matter of dispute. In Webster vs. Reid (11 How., 437), an act of the legislature of the Territory of Iowa dispensing with a jury in a certain class of common-law actions was held void. While in the opinion, on page 460, the seventh amendment was quoted, it was also said: "The organic law of the Territory of Iowa, by express provision and by reference, extended the laws of the United States, including the ordinance of 1787, over the Territory, so far as they are applicable," and the ordinance of 1787, Article II, in terms provided that "the inhabitants of the said Territory shall always be entitled to the writ of habeas corpus, and of the trial by jury." So the invalidity may have been adjudged by reason of the conflict with Congressional legislation. In Reynolds vs. United States (98 U. S., 145, 154), it was said, in reference to a criminal case coming from the Territory of Utah, that—
> "By the Constitution of the United States (Amendment VI) the accused was entitled to trial by an impartial jury." Both of these cases were quoted in Callan vs. Wilson (127 U. S., 540) as authorities to sustain the ruling that the provisions in the Constitution of the United States relating to trial by jury are in force in the District of Columbia. On the other hand, in Mormon Church vs. United States (136 U. S., 1, 44) it was said by Mr. Justice Bradley, speaking for the court:
> "Doubtless Congress in legislating for the Territories would be subject to those fundamental limitations in favor of personal rights which are formulated in the Constitution and its amendments; but these limitations would exist rather by inference and the general spirit of the Constitution, from which Congress derives all its powers, than by any express and direct application of its provisions."
>
> And in McAlister vs. United States (141 U. S., 174) it was held that the constitutional provisions in respect to the tenure of judicial offices did not apply to Territorial judges.
> But if the seventh amendment does not operate in and of itself to invalidate this Territorial statute, then Congress has full control over the Territories, irrespective of any express constitutional limitations, and it has legislated in respect to this matter.

What has been said as to the case of Callan vs. Wilson applies with equal force to the case of Capital Traction Company vs. Hof, reported in 174 U. S.

The case of Thompson vs. Utah (170 U. S., 343) may also be cited as against the position for which I am contending. In that case Justice Harlan, delivering the opinion of the court, says at page 346:

> The Constitution of the United States provides: "That trial of all crimes except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury, and such trials be held in the State where the said crime shall have been committed; but when not committed within any State the trial shall be at such place or places as the Congress may by law have directed." (Article III, section 2.) And by the sixth amendment of the Constitution it is declared: "In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the States and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation, to be confronted with the witnesses against him, to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of council for his defense."
> That the provisions of the Constitution of the United States relating to the right of trial by jury in suits at common law apply to the Territories of the United States is no longer an open question. (Webster vs. Reid, 11 How., 437, 460; American Publishing Company vs. Fisher, 166 U. S. 464, 468; Springville vs. Thomas, 166 U. S., 707.)

And also at page 347:

> It is equally beyond question that the provisions of the National Constitution relating to trials by jury for crimes and to criminal prosecutions apply to the Territories of the United States.

A mere statement of that case will be sufficient to show that the argument of the learned justice as to Article III, section 2, of the Constitution, and as to the amendments, was wholly unnecessary to the decision of the case, and must therefore be regarded as extrajudicial or a mere dictum. It was this: The law of the Territory of Utah provided that a trial jury in criminal cases should consist of twelve persons. The crime was committed while this law was in effect. Subsequently the constitution of the State of Utah provided for the trial of this crime by a jury of eight persons. The case was clearly covered by subsection 1 of section 10 of Article I of the Constitution, prohibiting a State from passing an ex post facto law.

I next call attention to cases relating to citizenship, which is considered by some to be a matter of great importance. But before proceeding to their examination it will be necessary to examine carefully the provisions of the Constitution on that subject. Those necessary to be considered will be found in Article I, section 8, subsection 4, in Article IV, section 2, subsection 1, and in the fourteenth amendment, section 1. I do not conceive that there can be any objection to allowing the same persons to be naturalized in any of the recently acquired territories as in the territories heretofore acquired. The expression "throughout the United States" used in Article I, section 8, subsection 4, has already been considered in connection with the case of Loughborough vs. Blake, and what has been said there is equally applicable here. As to the provision contained in Article IV, section 2, subsection 1, it is by its terms applicable to the States, and what has been said as to the meaning of the word "State" in the Constitution might be repeated here. But as to the first section of the fourteenth amendment two questions arise:

First. Do the inhabitants of ceded territory become citizens of the United States within the meaning of the Constitution, ex proprio vigore that instrument, when the cession is complete?

Second. Will all persons hereafter born in these territories be citizens of the United States under the Constitution, ex proprio vigore?

It would seem that the answers to these questions are not dependent upon the establishment of a civil government therein. These territories belong now to the United States. They are now subject to the sovereignty of the nation. The allegiance of the inhabitants has been transferred to the United States. Of course, then, in the international and common law sense, they are citizens of the United States. But that is a different thing from citizenship under the Constitution. The question is, Are these islands a part of the United States within the meaning of the Constitution, and are persons born in them born in the United States, and therefore citizens within the meaning of that instrument? The provision defining citizenship does not wait upon the action of Congress; they are or they are not citizens by operation of the Constitution.

Certainly a treaty of cession may stipulate that the inhabitants of ceded territory may, all of them or a part of them, become citizens of the United States, either immediately upon the cession being complete or in the future, upon certain conditions or contingencies. The treaties with France, Mexico, and Spain, for the cessions heretofore acquired from them, all substantially provided the same thing:

> The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States, and in the meantime they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess.

It would seem that the makers of these treaties did not consider that the inhabitants of the ceded territory would become citizens of the United States, except by force of the treaty, or by statute, prior to the admission of the States to be formed out of it into the Union.

The Alaska treaty stipulated that—

The inhabitants, * * * with the exception of uncivilized native tribes, shall be admitted to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States, and shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion.

Citizenship here, as in the former cessions, is the result of treaty stipulation. And here again we note that the makers of the treaty did not consider that they would become such citizens by the operation of the Constitution and without such stipulation.

The definition in the Constitution is:

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside.

In Elk vs. Wilkins (112 U. S., 94) Gray, J., delivering the opinion, at pages 101 and 102, says:

This section contemplates two sources of citizenship, and two sources only—birth and naturalization. The persons declared to be citizens are "all persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof." The evident meaning of these last words is not merely subject in some respect or degree to the jurisdiction of the United States, but completely subject to their political jurisdiction and owing them direct and immediate allegiance. And the words relate to the time of birth in the one case, as they do to the time of naturalization in the other. Persons thus not subject to the jurisdiction of the United States at the time of birth can not become so afterwards except by being naturalized, either individually, as by proceedings under the naturalization acts, or collectively, as by the force of a treaty by which foreign territory is acquired.

Indians born within the territorial limits of the United States, members of and owing immediate allegiance to one of the Indian tribes (an alien though dependent power), although in a geographical sense born in the United States, are no more "born in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof" than the children of subjects of any foreign government born within the domain of that government or the children born within the United States of ambassadors or other public ministers of foreign nations.

And in United States vs. Wong Kim Ark (169 U. S., 649), at pages 702, 703, the same justice, delivering the opinion of the court, says:

The fourteenth amendment of the Constitution, in the declaration that "all persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside," contemplates two sources of citizenship, and only two—birth and naturalization. Citizenship by naturalization can only be acquired by naturalization under the authority and in the forms of law. Citizenship by birth is established by the mere fact of birth under the circumstances defined in the Constitution. Every person born in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof becomes at once a citizen of the United States and needs no naturalization. A person born out of the jurisdiction of the United States can only become a citizen by being naturalized either by treaty, as in the case of the annexation of foreign territory, or by authority of Congress, exercised either by declaring certain classes of persons to be citizens, as in the enactments conferring citizenship upon foreign-born children of citizens, or by enabling foreigners individually to become citizens by proceedings in the judicial tribunals, as in the ordinary provisions of the naturalization acts.

The recent treaty with Spain provides:

Spanish subjects, natives of the Peninsula, residing in the territory over which Spain by the present treaty relinquishes or cedes her sovereignty, * * * in case they remain in the territory, (they) may preserve their allegiance to the Crown of Spain by making before a court of record, witnin a year from the date of the exchange of ratifications of this treaty, a declaration of their decision to preserve such allegiance, in default of which declaration they shall be held to have renounced it and to have adopted the nationality of the territory in which they may reside. The civil rights and political status of the native inhabitants of the territories hereby ceded to the United States shall be determined by the Congress.

Here there is no naturalization by treaty, either of the natives or of the Spaniards, natives of the Peninsula, and it is clear from the opinions above quoted that the inhabitants of Puerto Rico and the Philippines, born there prior to the time of acquisition, do not become citizens of the United States, within the meaning of this amendment, by the mere fact of acquisition, but can only become so by naturalization under Congressional legislation. And it is also clear that uncivilized natives, under tribal relations, occupy the same status as our own Indians or the uncivilized tribes of Alaska. (See Cherokee Nation vs. Georgia, 5 Peters, 1; Kagama vs. United States, 118 U. S., 375; Talton vs. Mayes, 163 U. S., 376.) It may also be well to note that the naturalization act embraces only white persons and persons of African descent.

But how about persons born in these Territories after acquisition? To answer this we must answer the question, Are such persons born in the United States? And this brings us again to the meaning of the term "United States" in this amendment. If my contention, heretofore set forth, as to this is correct, it must mean the States united under the Constitution. The status of a person born outside the States is determined, not by the Constitution, but by the law of nations, the common law, and the statutes enacted by Congress. I have also pointed out the objects sought to be accomplished by the fourteenth amendment, and how it was framed and its language used with the language of the thirteenth amendment before those who framed and adopted it, and how they would have used other language if it had been intended that the words "in the United States" should include the Territories, and how a consideration of all the clauses of the Constitution shows the absence of any intention to extend the constitutional limitations beyond the limits of the States united under it, except where words are used which can bear no other interpretation.

If this be correct, we are bound to conclude that persons born beyond the limits of the States are citizens of the United States only in the international sense or the common-law sense, and not by force of the fourteenth amendment, and that they may be made citizens within the meaning of the Constitution only by treaty or by statute. Of course, it is not contended for a moment that the Constitution does not operate and have full force in Arizona and New Mexico and Oklahoma in this respect, and in respect to the personal and civil rights of all, but that it thus operates and has full force because it has been specifically extended to them by treaty or by statute.

That there are expressions in the opinion of Mr. Justice Miller in the Slaughterhouse cases (16 Wallace, 36), at page 73, which indicate the contrary view will not be denied. But that an examination of that case and of the opinion will show that they are extrajudicial and a dictum I think will be apparent. There the learned justice, speaking for the court, states that the first section of the fourteenth amendment defines citizenship, not only citizenship of the United States, but citizenship of the States; that no such definition was previously found in the Constitution, nor had any attempt been made to define it by act of Congress; that it had been the occasion of much discussion in the courts, by the Executive Departments, and in the public journals; that it had given rise to two questions which had been the subject of differences of opinion, to wit:

First. That no man was a citizen of the United States except as he was a citizen of one of the States composing the Union, and, therefore, those who had been born and resided always in the District of Columbia or in the Territories, though within the United States, were not citizens, which question had never been judicially decided.

Second. That a man of African descent, whether a slave or not, was not and could not be a citizen of a State or of the United States, which question had been decided in favor of the proposition by a decision which, while it met the condemnation of some of the ablest statesmen and constitutional lawyers of the country, had never been overruled.

He then goes on to say that the clause "All persons born or naturalized in the United States are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside," puts at rest both of these questions, and that, while there can be no doubt that its main purpose was to establish the citizenship of the negro, it declares that persons may be citizens of the United States without regard to their citizenship of a particular State, and that it makes all persons born within the United States, and subject to its jurisdiction, citizens of the United States.

In the conclusion drawn in these observations of the learned justice there is no conflict with the view which I have taken except in the wider meaning given to the phrase "in the United States." In the view which I have taken a person may be a citizen of the United States without reference to his citizenship of a particular State; indeed, he may be a citizen of the United States without being a citizen of any State. Such citizenship may be established by treaty or by statute, either as to the inhabitants of Territories or Indians born in tribal relations, but such citizenship is a legislative and not a constitutional citizenship. And what the legislative power may grant it may withhold. It, therefore, rests with Congress to grant or withhold citizenship to the inhabitants of these acquisitions.

That the observations made in this connection by the learned justice constitute a mere dictum will be shown by a consideration of the questions raised and decided. Indeed, part of the statement has been expressly overruled—that part wherein he says that the clause "and subject to the jurisdiction thereof" was intended to exclude from its operation children of citizens or subjects of foreign States born within the United States; for in the case of United States vs. Wong Kim Ark (167 U. S., 649) the court expressly held that a person born in the United States, of parents who are subjects of the Emperor of China, but have a permanent domicile and residence in the United States, and are there carrying on business, and are not employed in any diplomatic or official capacity under the Emperor of China, is a citizen of the United States and of the State wherein he is born or may thereafter reside.

In the Slaughterhouse Cases the State of Louisiana had passed an act which, in effect, created a monopoly, and the point was made that by it the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States were abridged. The court held that there is a citizenship of the United States, and a citizenship of a State, which are distinct from each other, and that it is only the privileges and immunities belonging to the former which are placed by this clause under the protection of the Federal Constitution, and that those belonging to the latter, whatever they may be, are not intended to have any additional protection by this paragraph of the amendment; that while there are certain privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, which owe their existence to the Federal Government, its national character, its Constitution, or its laws, which no State can abridge, the privileges and immunities alleged and relied on in the argument to have been abridged are those which belong to the citizens of the States as such, and that they are left to the State government for security and protection, and not by this article placed under the special care of the Federal Government; and that, therefore, there had been no abridgment of those privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States which are protected by this amendment.
